E. F. Swinney, president of the First National bank of Kansas City, was born in the south, says the Saturday Evening Post. He goes back home once or twice a year and it is part of the homecoming program to have Old Mose polish his shoes. Old Mose prides himself on the fact that he has known "Misteh Eddie" since he was born—and "his daddy befo' him."

When Mr. Swinney was there recently Mose was polishing his shoes. He stopped and asked:

"Well, Mose," Mr. Swinney replied, "you have seen ten silver dollars, haven't you? Now, imagine ten of those stacks and you have a hundred dollars. Then ten times that and you have $1,000. Then ten times that and you have $10,000—and 100 times that and you have a million."

"No, Mose—not if they were piled to the ceiling. What would you do if you had a million silver dollars, Mose?"

Mose stopped shining. He pondered for a minute. Then he said:

Deceived by Appearances.

John Melpolder, superintendent of the Boys' club, is very fond of walking. Melpolder was camping recently north of Broad Ripple and decided to walk to Indianapolis. The roads were dusty and the sun beat down unrelentingly. When Melpolder reached Broad Ripple he had covered ten or twelve miles and looked like a tramp. Coming to a fork in the road, and not being sure of the correct route, Melpolder approached two girls and a young man sitting in the shade.

"Can you tell me how to get to Indianapolis?" he asked. The correct road was pointed out and as he started to plod on one of the girls said:

"Why you are not going to walk, are you?"

"Why, yes," said the pedestrian, "I thought I would."

The young man fumbled in his pocket. "Here," he said, fishing out a dime, "you better ride the street car in. You can catch it about a square up the road."

Then each girl handed him a coin. Melpolder thanked them kindly for their proferred assistance, but declined the offer, saying that he preferred to walk. When he started on they looked after him in open-eyed astonishment.—Indianapolis News.

Real Comeback.

"Why do you spend so much care on the crease of your pants, hey?"

"It is important, dad, not to wear baggy trousers."

"Important, is it? Why, you young cub, look here. Did you ever see a statue to a man who didn't wear baggy pants?"—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"How was that?"

FARM AND ROAD IMPROVEMENT

POLE DRAG IS SERVICEABLE

Implement Should Be Drawn by Short Piece of Chain Attached to Center of Pole.

If you don't possess a land roller, the next best thing is a pole drag. The one shown in the cut is better than a roller for leveling and pulverizing the soil. It is composed of three hardwood poles 6 inches through and 7 feet long, writes Fred O. Shelby in the Farm and Home. They are fastened together about two feet apart by means of short pieces of chain.

To hold the seat a piece of board is bolted to the middle of the first pole and allowed to extend slightly beyond the last one. On top of this an old mowing machine seat is fastened, and the arrangement is such that while the seat is held in place the poles may work independently of each other. As the seat is bolted to the board, it can easily be removed, making the implement much easier to house when not in use. The drag should be drawn by a short piece of chain attached to the center of the first pole, as is indicated.

ALFALFA AS A SOILING CROP

Few Rations for All Kinds of Farm Animals That Cannot Be Improved by Addition of Hay.

(By W. M. KELLEY.)

On most farms where only a few acres of alfalfa can be grown successfully, I think the most will be realized from it, to cut the crop green and use it for green feeding. It is the best soiling crop that we can grow for all kinds of farm animals. There are few rations that cannot be improved both in economy and efficiency by the addition of alfalfa.

When using it for soiling purposes there is danger in feeding it to hungry sheep and cattle unless fed in moderate quantities after it has wilted. In my own practice I have found it safe to allow it to become wilted before feeding it to the sheep and cattle in the yards and stables.

In this way we can now mow enough to last two or three days at a time and haul it to the various feeding places for use when it is needed. It will keep in excellent condition if placed in cocks as soon as it is wilted and covered with cloth or canvas covers. In this way it escapes drying to brittleness and still keeps in ideal condition for feeding.

There is no danger in feeding wilted alfalfa to sheep and cattle that have become gradually accustomed to eating it. Many feeders give it to their work teams, but it requires the best of judgment to keep work teams in good vigorous condition and every change in the line of feeding should be gradual.

It is a good plan to cut and cure the first cutting for hay and then depend upon the later cuttings to supplement the pastures. A few acres of this valuable forage crop should be established on every stock farm.

WAY FOR STRETCHING WIRE

By Use of Wagon and Piece of Timber Hundred Yards May Be Tightened With One Pull.

To stretch a wire, back the wagon up to within a few feet of the corner post so that the inside of the wheel is in line with the fence. Raise that side of the wagon so the wheel will clear the ground and prop it up with a board. Then take a 2x4 about seven feet long, and place one end against the axle and the other on the ground, says the Iowa Homestead. After this is done tie a strong rope to one spoke inside the wheel, then to the wire and slowly turn the wheel, the rope wrapping around the hub tightening the wire. When you think the wire is tight enough place a piece of board between the spoke and bottom of the wagon box as shown in the illustration. This will keep the wire from slacking. From 80 to 100 rods of wire can be tightened in this way in one pull.

NEITHER HAYSEED NOR ANGEL

But There Need Be Little Question That Young Lady Had Much Ingenuity.

Across the line on the Kansas side where the study of agriculture is compulsory, one of the high school girls took home her monthly report card and proudly announced:

"I took the highest grade in the class in history, English literature and German."

"That's all very well," replied her father, critically examining the card, "but how about this grade in agriculture?"

"Oh, well," explained the daughter, "I'm no hayseed!"

"And how do you account for this grade in deportment?" he inquired.

"I'm no bloomin' angel, either," she replied.—Kansas City Star.

DANDRUFF 20 YEARS

743 Third Ave., New York, N. Y.—"Having been troubled with dandruff for twenty years and trying numerous lotions, washes, etc., without any effect, I thought I would give Cuticura Soap and Ointment a trial. The scalp always had dry skin on it which did not itch as I gave it a good brushing every morning and evening, but through the day the dandruff would show badly on my coat collar. I used the Cuticura Soap to shampoo my hair and rubbed in a little Cuticura Ointment. After a few treatments I found the head clean and healthy, free from all dry scales. Cuticura Soap and Ointment cured the dandruff, and now I use Cuticura to keep it from returning." (Signed) W. Dyke, Jan. 2, 1912.

"Things with me," he said, "are at sixes and sevens. I feel the great need of a woman in my home—one who would straighten out my tangled affairs and make life worth living once again.

"Yes?" she queried gently.

"Do you know," he continued, "of any good, able-bodied woman whom I could get to clean the house?"

Objections.

"You give up too easily. Why don't you get a grip?"

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Anne Gattle, a fellow passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers. Mrs. Wellington hears Little Jimmie's voice. Later she meets Mrs. Whitcomb. Mallory reports to Marjorie his failure to find a preacher. They decide to pretend a quarrel and Mallory finds a vacant berth. Mrs. Jimmie discovers Wellington on the train. Mallory again makes an unsuccessful hunt for a preacher. Dr. Temple poses as a physician. Mrs. Temple is induced by Mrs. Wellington to smoke a cigar. Sight of preacher on a station platform raises Mallory's hopes, but he takes another train. Missing hand baggage compels the couple to borrow from passengers. Jimmie gets a cinder in his eye and Mrs. Jimmie gives first aid. Coolness is then resumed. Still no clergyman. More borrowing. Dr. Temple puzzled by behavior of different couples. Marjorie's jealousy aroused by Mallory's baseball jargon. Marjorie suggests wrecking the train in hopes that accident will produce a preacher. Also tries to induce the conductor to hold the train so she can shop. Marjorie's dog is missing. She pulls the cord, stopping the train. Conductor restores dog and lovers quarrel. Lathrop wires for a preacher to marry him and Miss Gattle. Mallory tells Lathrop of his predicament and arranges to borrow the preacher. Kitty Lewellyn, former sweetheart of Mallory's, appears and arouses Marjorie's jealousy.

CHAPTER XXX.

A Wedding on Wheels.

The commotion of the matrimonyed women brought the men trooping in from the smoking room and there was much circumstance of decorating the scene with white satin ribbons, a trifle crumpled and dim of luster. Mrs. Whitcomb waved them at Mallory with a laugh:

"Recognize these?"

He nodded dismally. His own funeral baked meats were coldly furnishing forth a wedding breakfast for Ira Lathrop. Mrs. Wellington was moving about distributing kazoos and Mrs. Temple had an armload of old shoes, some of which had thumped Mallory on an occasion which seemed so ancient as to be almost prehistoric.

Fosdick was howling to the porter to get some rice, quick!

"How many portions does you approximate?"

"All you've got."

"Boiled or fried?"

"Any old way." The porter ran forward to the dining-car for the ammunition.

Mrs. Temple whispered to her husband: "Too bad you're not officiating, Walter." But he cautioned silence:

"Hush! I'm on my vacation."

The train was already coming into Ogden. Noises were multiplying and from the increase of passing objects, the speed seemed to be taking on a spurt. The bell was clamoring like a wedding chime in a steeple.

Mrs. Wellington was on a chair fastening a ribbon round one of the lamps, and Mrs. Whitcomb was on another chair braiding the bell rope with withered orange branches, when Ashton, with kazoo all ready, called out:

"What tune shall we play?"

"I prefer the Mendelssohn Wedding March," said Mrs. Whitcomb, but Mrs. Wellington glared across at her.

"I've always used the Lohengrin."

"We'll play 'em both," said Dr. Temple, to make peace.

Mrs. Fosdick murmured to her spouse: "The old Justice of the Peace didn't give us any music at all," and received in reward one of his most luscious-eyed looks, and a whisper: "But he gave us each other."

"Now and then," she pouted.

"But where are the bride and groom?"

"Here they come—all ready," cried Ashton, and he beat time while some of the guests kazooed at Mendelssohn's and some Wagner's bridal melodies, and others just made a noise.

Ira Lathrop and Anne Gattle, looking very sheepish, crowded through the narrow corridor and stood shamefacedly blushing like two school children about to sing a duet.

The train jolted to a dead stop. The conductor called into the car: "Ogden! All out for Ogden!" and everybody stood watching and waiting.

But Mallory turned away. What use had he now for ministers? His plans were shattered ruins.

The porter came flying in with two large bowls of rice, and shouting, "Here comes the 'possum—er—posse." Seeing Marjorie, he said: "Shall I perambulate Mista Snoozleums?"

She handed the porter her only friend and he hurried out, as a lean and professionally sad ascetic hurried in. He did not recognize his boyish enemy in the gray-haired, red-faced giant that greeted him, but he knew that voice and its gloating irony:

"Hello, Charlie."

He had always found that when Ira grinned and was cordial, some trouble was in store for him. He wondered what rock Ira held behind his back now, but he forced an uneasy cordiality: "And is this you, Ira? Well, well! It is years since last we met. And you're just getting married. Is this the first time, Ira?"

"First offense, Charlie."

The levity shocked Selby, but a greater shock was in store, for when he inquired: "And who is the—er—happy—bride?" the triumphant Lathrop snickered: "I believe you used to know her. Anne Gattle."

This was the rock behind Ira's back, and Selby took it with a wince: "Not—my old—"

"The same. Anne, you remember, Charlie."

"Oh, yes," said Anne, "How do you do, Charlie?" And she put out a shy hand, which he took with one still shyer. He was so unsettled that he stammered: "Well, well, I had always hoped to marry you, Anne, but not just this way."

Lathrop cut him short with a sharp: "Better get busy—before the train starts. And I'll pay you in advance before you set off the fireworks."

The flippancy pained Rev. Charles, but he was resuscitated by one glance at the bill that Ira thrust into his palm. If a man's gratitude for his wife is measured by the size of the fee he heeds the enabling parson, Ira was madly in love with Anne. Rev. Charles had a reminiscent suspicion that it was probably a counterfeit, but for once he did Ira an injustice.

The minister was in such a flutter from losing his boyhood love, and gaining so much money all at once and from performing the marriage on a train, that he made numerous errors in the ceremony, but nobody noticed them, and the spirit, if not the letter of the occasion, was there and the contract was doubtless legal enough.

The ritual began with the pleasant murmur of the preacher's voice, and the passengers crowded round in a solemn calm, which was suddenly violated by a loud yelp of laughter from Wedgewood, who omitted guffaw after guffaw and bent double and opened out again, like an agitated umbrella.

The wedding-guests turned on him visages of horror, and hissed silence at him. Ashton seized him, shook him, and muttered:

"What the—what's the matter with you?"

The Englishman shook like a boy having a spasm of giggles at a funeral, and blurted out the explanation:

"That story about the bridegroom—I just saw the point!"

Ashton closed his jaw by brute force and watched over him through the rest of the festivity.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Foiled Yet Again.

Mallory had fled from the scene at the first hum of the minister's words. His fate was like alkali on his palate. For twelve hundred miles he had ransacked the world for a minister. When one dropped on the train like manna through the roof, even this miracle had to be checkmated by a perverse miracle that sent to the train an early infatuation, a silly affair that he himself called puppy-love. And now Marjorie would never marry him. He did not blame her. He blamed fate.

He was in solitude in the smoking room. The place reeked with drifting tobacco smoke and the malodor of cigar stubs and cigarette ends. His plans were as useless and odious as cigarette ends. He dropped into a chair, his elbows on his knees and his head in his hands—Napoleon on St. Helena.

And then, suddenly he heard Marjorie's voice. He turned and saw her hesitating in the doorway. He rose to welcome her, but the smile died on his lips at her chilly speech:

"May I have a word with you, sir?"

"Of course. The air's rather thick in here," he apologized.

"Just wait!" she said, ominously, and stalked in like a young Zenobia. He put out an appealing hand: "Now, Marjorie, listen to reason. Of course I know you won't marry me now."

"Oh, you know that, do you?" she said, with a squared jaw.

"But, really, you ought to marry me—not merely because I love you—and you're the only girl I ever—" He stopped short and she almost smiled as she taunted him: "Go on—I dare you to say it."

He swallowed hard and waived the point: "Well, anyway, you ought to marry me—for your own sake."

Then she took his breath away by answering: "Oh, I'm going to marry you, never fear."

"You are," he cried, with a rush of returning hope. "Oh, I knew you loved me."

She pushed his encircling arms aside: "I don't love you, and that's why I'm going to marry you."

"But I don't understand."

"Of course not," she sneered, as if she were a thousand years old, "you're only a man—and a very young man."

"You've ceased to love me," he protested, "just because of a little affair I had before I met you?"

Marjorie answered with world-old wisdom: "A woman can forgive a man anything except what he did before he met her."

He stared at her with masculine dismay at feminine logic: "If you can't forgive me, then why do you marry me?"

"For revenge!" she cried. "You brought me on this train all this distance to introduce me to a girl you used to spoon with. And I don't like her. She's awful!"

"Yes, she is awful," Mallory assented. "I don't know how I ever—"

"Oh, you admit it!"

"No."

"Well, I'm going to marry you—now—this minute—with that preacher, then I'm going to get off at Reno and divorce you."

"Divorce me! Good Lord! On what grounds?"

Mallory was groggy with punishment, and the vain effort to foresee her next blow. "But you can't name a woman that way," he pleaded, "for just being nice to me before I ever met you."

"That's the worst kind of unfaithfulness," she reiterated. "You should have known that some day you would meet me. You should have saved your first love for me."

"But last love is best," Mallory interposed, weakly.

"Oh, no, it isn't, and if it is, how do I know I'm to be your last love? No, sir, when I've divorced you, you can go back to your first love and go round the world with her till you get dizzy."

"You'll get me—but not for long. And one other thing, I want you to get that bracelet away from that creature. Do you promise?"

"How can I get it away?"

"Take it away! Do you promise?"

Mallory surrendered completely. Anything to get Marjorie safely into his arms: "I promise anything, if you'll really marry me."

And while he stared in helpless awe at the cynic and termagant that jealousy had metamorphosed this timid, clinging creature into, they heard the conductor's voice at the rear door of the car: "Hurry up—we've got to start."

They heard Lathrop's protest: "Hold on there, conductor," and Selby's plea: "Oh, I say, my good man, wait a moment, can't you?"

The conductor answered with the gruffness of a despot: "Not a minute. I've my orders to make up lost time. All aboard!"

While the minister was tying the last loose ends of the matrimonial knot, Mallory and Marjorie were struggling through the crowd to get at him. Just as they were near, they were swept aside by the rush of the bride and groom, for the parson's "I pronounce you man and wife," pronounced as he backed toward the door, was the signal for another wedding riot.

Once more Ira and Anne were showered with rice. This time it was their own. Ira darted out into the corridor, hauling his brand-new wife by the wrist, and the wedding guests pursued them across the vestibule, through the next car, and on, and on.

Nobody remained to notice what happened to the parson. Having performed his function, he was without further interest or use. But to Mallory and Marjorie he was vitally necessary.

No More Fox Hunts for Him.

Arthur B. Selt, sheriff of Prince Georges county, Md., says he never again will indulge in a fox chase. He always was fond of the sport, but on the occasion of his last chase he had such an unpleasant and exciting experience that he concluded to go after smaller game in the future.

"We had been out but a short while," he related to friends, "before we were on a trail, but it took us some time to dig the fox from his hole. A skunk was the fox's companion and both came out together."

Both animals were killed and taken to Forestville.

"With our party was a dare-devil sort of a fellow," the sheriff said, "and he rode his horse through the village store, the skunk hanging to the animal's side.

"The store was quickly deserted," he added, "and I resolved to participate in no more such hunts."

School Land Ship.

One of the features of their public school training which the boys of Berlin, Germany, enjoy most is the "land ship," on which young sailors go through a regular daily training. The Iltis is the name of the land ship which has been built and which has a crew of 120 boys. The larger boys act as officers. When they are at work on the land ship the boys dress in middy blouses and caps. There is gun practice on the land ship every day, and a naval drill, and all the usual work of a ship is done by the boys. They have the greatest fun in climbing the spars and hoisting the sails, and life on the Iltis is so popular that there are always more applicants for the crew than there are places to be filled.

Mental Distraction.

"Do you think young women ought to join the suffragettes?" asked the young woman.

"I do," replied Mr. Growcher; "I am in favor of anything that will take their minds off the fact that this is leap year."

BABY'S HAPPINESS DEPENDS ON HEALTH

When your baby is cross and fretful instead of the happy, laughing little dear you are accustomed to, in all probability the digestion has become disarranged and the bowels need attention. Give it a mild laxative, dispel the irritability, and bring back the happy content of babyhood.

The mother should make sure that the laxative used contains no opiate or narcotic drug. A mild, pleasant-tasting, harmless laxative like Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is ideal for children because of its natural composition and gentle action. A small dose of Syrup Pepsin at bedtime will bring easy, certain relief next morning, and with no distressful griping or other discomfort. You can get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drug store. Your name and address on a postal to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 West St., Monticello, Ill., will bring a free trial bottle by return mail. Adv.

Fable for Borrowers.

An Arab went to his neighbor and said: "Lend me your rope."

"I can't," said the neighbor.

"Why can't you?"

"Because I went to use the rope myself."

"For what purpose?" the other persisted.

"I went to tie up five cubic feet of water with it."

"How on earth," sneered the would-be borrower, "can you tie up water with a rope?"

"My friend," said the neighbor, "Allah is great and he permits us to do strange things with a rope when we don't want to lend it."—Boston Evening Transcript.

He accepted meekly the "quiet rebuke."—Springfield Republican.

That Wonderful Event

IF THERE is a time above all times when a woman should be in perfect physical condition it is the time previous to the coming of her babe.

During this period many women suffer from headache, sleeplessness, pains of various description, poor appetite, and a host of other ailments which should be eliminated in justice to the new life about to be ushered into this world.

DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION

is a scientific medicine carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to the needs and requirements of woman's delicate system. It has been recommended for over forty years as a remedy for those peculiar ailments which make their appearance during "the expectant" period. Motherhood is made easier by its use. Thousands of women have been benefited by this great medicine.

Your druggist can supply you in liquid or tablet form, or you can send 50 one-cent stamps for a trial box of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription Tablets, to Dr. Pierce, at Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo.

It is your privilege to write to Dr. Pierce for advice, and it will be gladly given free of charge. Of course all communications are confidential.

Proof that most men like "Bull" Durham

Fact No. 1—"Bull" Durham has outsold any other tobacco since 1859.

Fact No. 3—"Bull" Durham has increased its sale every year of its existence.

Four tremendous facts. Four facts that are absolute proof of quality. Four facts for you to remember when you buy tobacco.

GENUINE "BULL" DURHAM SMOKING TOBACCO

Forty "rollings" in each 5c muslin sack

is just the sweetest, purest, finest leaf grown down on that famous sunshine belt in Virginia and North Carolina. "Bull" Durham is all tobacco—rich, mild, fragrant—just as fresh and natural as when it leaves the field—not an artificial thing about it.

"Bull" Durham is packed in plain muslin sacks, instead of in fancy tin boxes. That's why you get more value in the tobacco itself.

Join the "Bull" Durham army today—the sooner you fill your pipe with it or make yourself a fragrant "Bull" Durham cigarette—the quicker you'll get real smoke satisfaction.

The Corrector of Destinies

Being Tales of Randolph Mason as Related by His Private Secretary, Courtland Parks

THE INTRIGUER

By Melville Davisson Post

Copyright by Edward J. Clode

I was one of that fortunate audience before which Gafki played the "Bronze Helmet" at the Broad Street theater in Philadelphia. It was a notable event in America. Gafki came directly from Berlin, and staged the drama in its every detail, as he had done it for the emperor at the National theater on Unter den Linden. Philadelphia society possessed the Broad street theater that night. A prohibitive tariff set by Gafki barred out many.

I can recall but few details of the "Bronze Helmet" after the first act. When the curtain came down I went over to the box of the aged Mrs. Van Couver-Benson to talk a little with Margaret Garnett. She and her father, the president of the Consolidated Fuel Railroads of Pennsylvania, were about to sail for a winter's visit with our Ambassador at London, and this was my only opportunity to present personal adieus. Mrs. Van Couver-Benson is a mere wisp of a woman, one at the road's end, painfully clinging a moment longer to life. She sat in a corner of the box, a bit of breathing wax covered with costly laces, isolated by deafness. Margaret Garnett was alone, but for this senile aunt.

She welcomed graciously my arrival in the box.

"How do you do, Courtlandt," she said. Then she waived a presentation to the ancient aunt with a screening pleasantry. "Aunt Van is absorbed in the perils of Caesar; sit down by me."

I sat down, and touched at once on the motive of my visit. "I came," I said, "to wish you favorable winds."

She turned to me instantly. "We are not going," she said.

"Not going!" I echoed. "Why not?"

She laughed a little. "There is a man in the way."

I flecked the chair arm lightly with my finger. "How little a thing," I said, "to stay the sailing of Semiramis."

"Not so little a thing," she answered to my flippant sally. "If you will look presently at the first chair of the fifth row on the right of the center aisle, you will see him. Is he, then, so little a thing?"

I looked a moment later with a rising interest. The man who sat in that first chair of the fifth row was never a little factor in any human equation. He was on this day a star deflecting the orbits of political leaders in his state, one playing at the Gracchi—the Commoner, sustained by the toiling hive, but he was not of it. He came of a family older yet than Penn; one powerful under the first congress, but afterward contentedly fallow through idle generations, and now, by the medium of this man, returning actively to life.

The career of this man was something of a wonder to us all. Commanding by his birth a station of the highest order, he had of his own volition become a leader of the people; and then, when he stood an authority to be reckoned with in the placing of federal patronage, he chose strangely and with a small spirit, we thought, the position of a United States marshal. The men who usually got this office were aspiring sheriffs. Why, then, did this man, reared in kings' houses, thus strangely wish it?

I forgot on the instant Gafki and his "Bronze Helmet." Here was indeed news. The engagement of Margaret Garnett! The big Englishmen would not haunt now our Ambassador's house in Park Lane. The tall girl's destiny had arrived.

I made the usual conventional speeches, a bit highly colored, I fear—rather eulogistic, over-appreciative, laden with tropical platitudes.

She heard me, like a sphinx calmly to the end, then she dropped a guillotine knife on the dainty speeches.

"Very pretty, Courtlandt," she said, "but you are giving tongue on the wrong trail. Mr. Wood is not at present intending to marry me. He is absorbingly engaged in an effort to advance his own fortunes, somewhat at the cost of my father's."

I stammered my way back, and she went on, covering thus unconsciously my confusion.

"I fear that father is not coming off as he would wish in this contest with Mr. Wood. He laughed a little at the opening skirmish, somewhat like Gafki's Caesar, sitting in his tent; but within the last month he has advanced his standards, as Caesar always did when he was being cut to pieces. You see how much I am influenced by this thing of Gafki. Father has abandoned our winter in London. He must be here, happy if by being here he can prevail against Mr. Wood. It is in this manner, Courtlandt, that the man at the end of the fifth row is standing in the way."

I was still deeply puzzled. How could one of but moderate fortunes, a mere United States marshal, interrupt thus seriously the plans of an industrial emperor like John A. Garnett. I waited for further explanation. It did not immediately come.

"Courtlandt," she said, "tell me about Randolph Mason."

"Randolph Mason," I echoed. "What interest can you have in Randolph Mason?"

"You will learn that a little further on," she said. Then the dominant quality in her, in her father, in every Garnett, came imperiously forward: "Begin now, Courtlandt, please; I am listening."

I began then with what willing spirit I could summon.

Margaret Garnett listened closely, putting now and then a query, and glancing now and then at the man who sat applauding in that first chair of the fifth row, as though to establish somehow, a relation there with this manin of Randolph Mason. It was evident that I was telling her nothing that she had not already heard.

"I am almost wishing, Courtlandt," she said, "that Randolph Mason would refuse to assist my father in the fight with Mr. Wood. It seems to be making the game unfair, like the Rhine helping the Germans there against Caesar. This drama of Gafki, like all Homeric echoes, outrages my sense of fair play. There was not, as I remember, a clean fight in the whole Iliad; some god was always lending a hand."

"I ought, as a dutiful daughter, to hold a keener interest in my father's side of it, I suppose," she said. "If Mr. Wood is not checkmated, father's railroads will go into receivership; and if my father crushes him, he will go, in every sense, under the ax. So I ought to be fired with a certain barbaric eagerness for victory, and so, in a way, I am. But somehow, at the bottom of me, I wish to see the fight fair. No handicaps, no Olympic legging, the winning to the best men."

This impassioned speech was interrupted by a thin piping voice, little more than a bird's chirp. "Please, Margaret," it said, "I am tired. May I go home?" The old aunt had awakened. Her face was plaintive, like a child's. Time, having made life's circuit with her, was returning her to dissolution by the cradle.

I summoned the old woman's maids, and they got her, with the footman's assistance, to the carriage. I went out with Margaret Garnett. She harked back to her theme a moment as I took my leave of her. "Good-night, Courtlandt," she said. "Please keep Randolph Mason a neutral in this fight. It is too fine a struggle to be spoiled by an outsider. If father wins, I shall have this man's head on a charger, if I wish it. If he loses let the victor sell me into slavery."

I turned to call a hansom, when one of the theater attendants touched me on the arm.

"I beg your pardon," he said; "can you tell me if this article belongs to Miss Garnett? It was picked up by an usher in her box." He held in his hand a flat gold locket attached to a chain linking alternately a topaz and an opal. I carried the locket to the light and examined it. The case was without a mark. I pulled it open to see if there was any inside, and I found there such a one as left no doubt remaining. The locket contained the picture of her father, and opposite it, of all persons on this earth, the face of Thomas B. Wood.

I returned the locket to the waiting lackey. "It is certainly Miss Garnett's," I said; "you would better send it immediately to her residence."

On Thursday morning the counsel of John A. Garnett called on Randolph Mason. When Pietro brought him into the office I took him for some celebrated actor.

"I have the honor," he said, "to address Mr. Parks, I believe, the secretary of Randolph Mason. My name is Alger. I am here on a matter for John A. Garnett."

I hid under a conventional greeting the flaming interest which these words lighted. Here was the envoy which Margaret Garnett said her father was about to send. I did not know that this meeting was by appointment, until Randolph Mason appeared on the threshold of the folding-doors between the two rooms. He spoke to me.

"I shall be engaged with Mr. Alger for the next half hour. Direct Pietro to admit no one." Then he went back into the room, followed by the attorney. I presently found Pietro, gave him the directions and returned to my table, where I could witness through the folding-doors this conference which Margaret Garnett wished so greatly to prevent. It was Randolph Mason who began the conversation.

"Can you give me briefly," he said, "the history of this case?"

The attorney was not moved to a hasty recital by Mason's abrupt impatience. He sat down in a chair before the table, lifted his face, serene with that deep internal composure common to those who are accustomed to speak the last irrevocable word, and regarded Randolph Mason as he doubtless would have regarded some strange, unfamiliar tribunal, to be carefully addressed. When he spoke, his voice was as clear as glass, although it seemed to loiter on the sentences deliberately.

"I cannot give you this matter briefly," he said; "a certain elaboration is unavoidable. A recital of mere overt acts will not convey a sense of that large plan to which they are preliminary. I must be pardoned if I add some collateral features and some comment."

Randolph Mason's face took on an expression of unwilling assent, such an expression as one observes frequently on the face of an examiner in the courtroom, who, failing to bring his witness clearly to the issue, abandons him to his own manner of recital. He sat down in his chair, placed his hands idly before him on the table and then dropped his body leisurely back, like one hopelessly fated to a long story. These suggestive actions were not lost on the attorney; he knew exactly by what mental conceptions they were inspired. A faint shade of color came for an instant into his face and vanished, but his voice deliberately continued:

"The Consolidated Fuel Railroads Company, of which John A. Garnett is president and chief owner, is made up of the principal lines running into the Pennsylvania coal fields. They reach some five thousand workings, employing several hundred thousand men. They are the avenues by which this product is conveyed to the seaboard. This railroad company depends for its tonnage, and therefore for its existence, exclusively upon the production of these mines. If these mines are idle the railroad is idle, but with the distinction that a mine can shut down and lie so without expense, while a railroad must continue as an active concern, no matter at what a loss. Now, as you are doubtless aware, an effort is being made to form an alliance of these mine workers. The result is that an epic life struggle is about to open between the railroad and its mines on one side and the representatives of the workers on the other, the sort of industrial conflict that means bankruptcy for the one and starvation for the other. The men have not money enough to keep their families for a month, and the railroad company, having no tonnage, will necessarily make default in the payment of the interest on its bonds, and go into the hands of a receiver."

"The only real authority of this Republic is the federal courts. They alone, under every emergency, rigidly sustain the law. But a court must have officers. The hand signing the writ must be supported by the hand serving a writ. An order, no matter how fearlessly entered, must fail of its purpose if it be enforced with excuses. I come now to the very heart of this matter. People do not break out into rebellion unless they have an ally sitting somewhere in authority. This strike threatened in Pennsylvania has such an ally. It would fail, it would collapse like a punctured balloon, if his aid were removed. I do not mean any of the judges; they are incorruptible. I mean Thomas B. Wood, the United States marshal.

"A word must be spoken about this remarkable man to make that charge clear: He is thirty-eight years old; he intends to be a United States senator, and, what is more important for the future, he intends to remain one.

"Bear in mind that Wood's intention was to become a senator. He began, then, with the people. He attached himself to all movements in behalf of labor. He observed the clamor of the man with the pick, the man with the apron, the man with the hammer. He appeared to listen, to consider, presently to be convinced, and, finally, to advocate what they said. Then, under that law which I do not understand but by virtue of which Mirabeau, a noble, became the idol of the French Revolution, this man, an aristocrat, became a leader of the people. So when his party came presently to national power, the great heads of it found him there to be dealt with. What did he want? They said it with a certain deference. He might have demanded his seat in the upper congress then, but he could not hope to remain there, he had no pedestal of gold under him; he was standing on the sands. He chose the position of United States marshal. The leaders gave it with a certain wondering contempt, and dismissed him from their catalogue of fears. He was, then, a person of no ambition—one struggling titanically for pottage!

"Immeasurably not so! The political Warwick of Pennsylvania is John A. Garnett. The power under him is the Consolidated Fuel Railroads. Wood wished to direct that Warwick, to control that power, therefore he chose wisely the only position in which he could destroy him, that of United States marshal. Garnett, usually clear-headed, usually far-sighted, usually running swiftly before events, saw the thing forty-eight hours too late, and, consequently, he is ruined."

"With Wood standing now between the worker and judges, the greatest industrial contest in our history is beginning. The mines of Pennsylvania will become smoking holes in the earth; the railroad, two bands of rust, and Garnett, a pauper. All this certainly, swiftly, inevitably, is arriving, unless this man can be removed from office.

"It is ruin then, or the man's terms, which are a voting control of the Consolidated Fuel Railroads, the position of first vice-president, a political dictatorship above and behind Garnett. Then he will resign. With Wood stepping down from the position of United States marshal, the opposition will crash through like a rotten bridge, Garnett's commercial plans will go smoothly onto the piling up of millions; but Garnett will have a master, and Pennsylvania's senator with a life tenure in office."

The attorney leaned forward in his chair, his eyes rested steadily on Mason, the index finger of his right hand arose in a direct and a significent gesture.

"The problem, then," he said, "is to remove Wood without the payment of his price—a thing no man can do."

"How?" said the attorney, his finger still lifted, his voice still impressively deliberate.

"Leave that to me," said Mason.

"Very well," he said. "What am I to do?"

"What have you intended to do?" replied Mason.

"I see nothing to do," continued the attorney, "other than to accept the conditions of Thomas B. Wood—to surrender, to give him what he demands."

"Do it then," said Mason.

"You give it up then, you bid me ruin Garnett?"

"I bid you save him," said Mason.

"But," continued the attorney, "when this agreement is once effected, what will be there to save him?"

"I shall be there," replied Randolph Mason.

When the attorney left after his conference with Randolph Mason, I wrote a note to Margaret Garnett. "Have a care," I said, "Randolph Mason is no longer neutral."

The next morning brought an answer in the large, firm writing of an Englishwoman: Miss Garnett would be at the Dresden at one o'clock. Would I come there? I was there at the hour, and we lunched together.

In spite of the fact that directness was the first quality in the nature of Margaret Garnett, I thought she approached the subject in question with trepidation. She did not ask me for the story of the conference. She drew out, rather, here and there a feature of it by some subtle query, put inconsequently in the course of our talk.

Presently, when she knew in general what had happened, her face took on virile firmness.

"Courtlandt," she said, "you are evidently not a poet, or else you would see how deplorable a thing it would be to spoil this struggle between my father and Mr. Wood.

"It would be crude, barbaric, ugly to throw to one or the other a balance of power. It would ruin the high dramatic tone of the game; it would be vandalism, like spoiling a canvas of Raphael, or a manuscript of Horace."

"Miss Garnett," I said, "this is all very beautiful, to quote your own appropriate words; but, pardon me, are you not 'giving tongue on the wrong trail?' These lines should be spoken to Randolph Mason, and not to his flattered, but powerless, secretary."

She colored perceptibly; then her face took on resolution. "Very well," she returned, "I will say them to Randolph Mason."

I wished then that I had said nothing. It was worse than idle to go on such an errand to Randolph Mason.

There was no escape, so I went with Margaret Garnett in her carriage to Randolph Mason.

I began then, somewhat late in the hour, to prepare her for this meeting. I advised her of Mason's curious habits, of his unusual abstraction. I warned her against his abrupt, indifferent manner, his rigid, searching, brutal inquiries. If she had any sensibilities to be hurt, or any fragile ideas of courtesy to be outraged, we would do better to go back on the instant.

Mason deliberately laid down the pen in his fingers and lifted his head, with the expression of one who submits out of necessity to an interruption.

"Mr. Mason," the girl began, "I am Margaret Garnett. I wish to inquire why you care so greatly for my father to prevail over Mr. Wood."

"I do not care," he said.

The young woman was evidently surprised. "What interest have you in my father, then?" she inquired.

"I have no interest in him," replied Randolph Mason.

"No interest?" she repeated. "Why did my father's attorney come here?"

"Why do you come here?" returned Mason.

She began to speak then, her voice vibrating like the tense string of a viol. She repeated, but in finer sequence, all she had said to me on that night of Gafki's drama, and all that she had later said over our luncheon. The spirit of the woman came forth on the flood; she was deeply, vitally, passionately in earnest, speaking against a sacrilege, speaking against a wrong, demanding, urging, pleading with Randolph Mason to remain immovably neutral. Let the struggle between her father and this man be fair. Let its thrilling, dramatic balance remain undisturbed. She was the one whose interest for her father should be deepest, and she, above all things in this world, wished to see the game played out by the two now seated at the table. It was weak, cowardly in her father to come here for aid. If he could not win alone, fairly, like a man, then she, his daughter, Margaret Garnett, wished him to lose.

The woman thus fired with transcendent courage was superb. My blood sang under her words. The nerves in my fingers tingled, but Randolph Mason sat watching her with weary unconcern. When she had finished he lifted his face, hard as metal.

"May I inquire," he said, "why you are thus endeavoring to deceive me?"

The girl caught her breath as though she had been dashed with water. "I am not endeavoring to deceive you," she said.

"Why, then," said Mason, "have you made me these lurid speeches?"

"I have made them," replied the girl, "to acquaint you with my motive for wishing you to remain neutral."

"Pardon me," said Mason, "you have made them to conceal that motive."

"I do not understand you," she said.

"But I understand you perfectly," replied Randolph Mason.

Then he arose and walked past her out into the hall.

I returned over the flag-stone walk with Miss Garnett to her carriage. I could find no words of adequate apology. "Courtlandt," she said, "tell your cold, unemotional master that since he has so ruthlessly taken from my fingers the weapons of a man, I shall meet him with the weapons of a woman."

The only occasion on which I have ever known Randolph Mason to go out of New York in any man's behalf was when he went to the residence of John A. Garnett at Bryn Mawr, a suburb of Philadelphia. The railroad magnate and the aspiring marshal had arrived at terms, as I understood it, or, rather, the one had accepted in capitulation the terms of the other. The conference was to conclude this treaty. I accompanied Randolph Mason, as I usually did.

The Garnett residence at Bryn Mawr is one of the most distinctive in America. It is a reproduction in white marble of the Petit Trianon at Versailles, set exquisitely in a forest, with white glistening roads winding among the trees and a brook and a bit of manufactured meadow.

This conference between the richest man in America and the most ambitious was held in the library of this transplanted Parisian lodge.

I could not easily bear in mind in the atmosphere of such a place the hard, practical nature of this meeting. It was the hall of some stately council of Florence, sitting above the Arno, or, rather—and the fancy became almost real—it was the council chamber of some doge, where on this night he was to meet the captain of Barbarian armies lying with bared teeth along the Adriatic, and treat with him for the city. The men in this conference might appropriately have taken the characters of such a scene. Garnett, tall, white, impressively patrician, attended, like that doge, by two counselors, characteristic, I fancied, of an empire in the evening of decadence—his attorney and Randolph Mason; and the other, this giant, this captain of Barbarian armies, courageously alone.

This romantic medieval fancy persisted. It became for an instant even more real when through an opening of the door I saw Margaret Garnett.

She was not listening. She carried rather the air of one depending upon some desperate hazard, the arrival of some event, the sharp stroke of some impending fortune. She went slowly down the steps, her hands slipping along the marble rail of the balusters.

The attorney seated at the table began to read the protocol of treaty which he had drawn, and I came swiftly back to the commonplace business character of the meeting. The paper was merely an assignment under the legal form of a majority of the common stock of the Consolidated Fuel Railroads to certain persons named by Thomas B. Wood. The attorney explained that, in his opinion, no further writing was necessary. This assignment should be placed in escrow. (A fully executed writing, but put into the custody of some third person to hold until the fulfillment of some condition), and delivered to Mr. Wood upon the resignation of his office. It would put a voting control of the railroad into the hands of his agents, who would carry out his plan.

The strong, masterful face of the United States marshal set in a cynical smile. "This assignment is, I think, sufficient," he said; "but I will hardly take the chance of a legal battle over an escrow, after my resignation shall have been accepted."

The negotiation seemed on the instant to be conclusively blocked. Garnett insisted upon the protection of an escrow, and Wood upon the possession of the paper before he irrevocably resigned his office.

Randolph Mason came forward then, sat down at the table, dipped a pen into the ink pot and turned toward the United States marshal.

"In consideration of the assignment of this stock to your trustees," he said, "you agree, I believe, to resign your office."

"You have it correctly," replied the man.

Randolph Mason drew a writing pad over to his hand and wrote rapidly a memorandum of the same date as the assignment, requesting the consideration for the transfer of the stock. He spoke then to the attorney. "Give me the assignment," he said. Then he added a line at the bottom, showing it to depend upon an agreement of the same date. When he had finished he again addressed the United States marshal. "Prepare your resignation," he said.

Mr. Wood sat down opposite Mason at the table. He wrote out his resignation of the office of United States marshal; then he placed his hand on the paper and spoke to Randolph Mason. "I do not see that we are any further along," he said. "I will not consent to an escrow under any agreement, no matter how explicit."

Randolph Mason did not at once reply. He presented the paper he had written to Mr. Garnett for his signature. While the railroad president was signing the assignment, the attorney answered for Randolph Mason, explaining that the agreement should be filed with the trust company holding the assignment, in order that the terms of the escrow could not be mistaken.

The powerful hand of Thomas B. Wood, resting on his written resignation, clenched. "I will not consent to an escrow," he repeated.

Randolph Mason thrust across the table the paper which he had made out. "Sign that," he said.

The man took the memorandum, affixed his signature and laid it on the letter of resignation under his clenched hand. His face darkened. "I trust," he said, "that my words are intelligible. I have twice said that I would not consent to an escrow."

"There shall be no escrow," said Randolph Mason.

The attorney for John A. Garnett leaned forward in his chair. "How then," he said, "is Mr. Wood to obtain this assignment?"

"I shall give it to him," replied Randolph Mason. Then he picked up the assignment and handed it to the United States marshal. "Take this," he said, "and leave on the table the papers under your hand."

The shadows in the resolute face of Thomas B. Wood vanished. He got up, put the assignment into his pocket, buttoned his great coat, took up his driving gloves from the table, bade us good-evening and went out of the room, down the stairway to his horses.

I came back wonderingly to Randolph Mason. His boast that he would be here to prevent the ruin of Garnett was idle. He rather had speeded that ruin. The attorney regarded him with cold serenity.

"Have you in fact," he asked, "any interest in the success of John A. Garnett?"

"I have not," he said. Then he continued, like one explaining briefly to an annoying query. "I am interested only in removing this man from his office, in correcting thereby the wrong of his appointment."

"Ah," said the attorney. "I understand, then, why you so readily cut from under us the only possible foothold against this man—that of an escrow. With Wood once out of office, the delivery of this paper might have been enjoined."

"Sir," replied Mason, "your purposed flimsy trick was patent even to Wood."

"Perhaps," said the attorney, "but in a shipwreck no plank can be allowed to pass. You had no right to come into this affair, if you had no regard for Mr. Garnett's peril."

"Since I came into the affair," replied Randolph Mason, "Mr. Garnett has never been in peril."

This conversation with its last enigmatic answer of Randolph Mason was interrupted by the abrupt entrance of Margaret Garnett.

She spoke to Randolph Mason, ignoring the rest of us as though we were interminably distant.

"You, even you," she said, "could not defeat him. He got what he wanted in spite of you."

"Thomas B. Wood," he replied, "has got nothing."

"Nothing!" she repeated. "Do you call a control of my father's railroads nothing? a control of millions nothing? a seat in the United States senate nothing? And what have you taken from him for it? Indeed, what have you taken! A paltry federal office!"

"I have taken," replied Randolph Mason, "the little that he had, and I have given nothing." Then he added as though likewise in explanation to the rest of us, "In the removal of this man from his office it was not my intention that he should obtain any benefit from John A. Garnett."

"Then," she cried, "you have failed."

"I have not failed," replied Randolph Mason, speaking with cold precision. "This assignment of stock was delivered to Thomas B. Wood in consideration of the resignation of his office. Such contracts are void as against public policy. The Consolidated Fuel Railroads will refuse to recognize the validity of this agreement, and it cannot be enforced in the courts. It cannot avail this man that the paper is in legal form and recites another and valid consideration, when the moving consideration was in fact the resignation of a federal office."

The atmosphere of a victory rising about John A. Garnett was less impressive than that atmosphere of disaster fallen thus swiftly on his daughter. The wondrous vitality of her figure vanished; the light fled from the silver, the blood from the porcelain. Then, as by some masterful effort, going to the very springs of life, it all splendidly returned. She looked steadily at Randolph Mason, her eyes two lines of light.

"I repeat it," she said slowly, "you have failed. This man shall receive everything that he expected to receive—my father's influence, the controlling interest in this railroad and a seat in the United States senate."

The lips of Randolph Mason parted in a cynical smile. "I should be interested to learn," he said, "by what avenue of propitious fortune he is to obtain these benefits."

"I shall marry him," replied Margaret Garnett.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

"One Leetle Kees?" Thumped With a Rolling Pin

I'LL GIVE YOU A KISS!

Joseph Luco, recently from Italy and with high notions of romance, stole unobserved into a flat at 428 West Huron street the other day and assumed his most irresistible posture as he surprised Mrs. Mary Belinsky at work making a batch of bread.

Two hours later Luco sat in a cell at the Chicago avenue police station nursing a big hump on his head and trying to think how he happened to get from the second story window to the ground so quickly. It happened something like this, according to Mrs. Belinsky, who also charged Luco with the theft of $10:

"One what!" Mrs. Belinsky had asked in momentary alarm.

"One leetle kees, no more," said Luco.

"Well, here's a regular smack!" exclaimed Mrs. Belinsky. The doughy rolling pin waved through a cloud of flour, there was a sharp crack, and a dull thud. Luco took the count. Mrs. Belinsky was frightened and tried to to leave the room. Then there was a struggle that aroused the curiosity of neighbors in the flat beneath.

"Here; here! What's going on?" demanded Sam Dubois, rushing upstairs and pausing at the door.

"I am going to kees you," Dubois swore that he heard Luco say

"Let's throw him out of the window," suggested Dubois. So Mrs. Belinsky sat on Luco's chest while Dubois hurriedly raised the window. Then the two took the invader on either side and gave him a sailor's toss over the ledge. It was 25 feet to the ground.

Genus Hobo Approves of Kiosk Tent as a "Flop"

CLEVELAND, O.—The populace stormed and fumed about the kiosk in the Square the other day, wondering how the thermometer and the rest of the public-spirited instruments located there were conducting themselves in the gelid air.

The kiosk is surrounded by a little tent without a roof, formed of painter's flies. A week or so ago an energetic painter and decorator painted the kiosk a nice, peaceful battleship gray color.

The paint had been dry for three or four days, but the tent remained. No doubt the man has forgotten all about it. Detective Julius Speos of Central station walked by there the other night, and, shivering a bit in the chill air, bethought himself of finding out what was what. He noticed a movement of the canvas that made him suspect someone was beneath the tent.

Lifting it and looking underneath, he discovered the recumbent figures of two members of the box car gentry. They had calculated that the tent would not be a bad place to sleep, albeit there was no roof.

WOT YUH DOIN THERE. HEY?

"Wot are you doin 'there?" demanded Spees.

"Well, we thought it would be a good place to 'flop,'" replied one. "Out of the wind and all the modern conveniences—pretty swell to have a regular thermometer and all the regular tools for knowing just what kind of weather it is, right in yer bedroom."

Spees advised them to move on. As they started away a diffident youngster approached him and said:

"Please, mister, when does the show start, and can I carry water for the eleyfunt?"

"Backnumber Joe" Quits Business With a Fortune

THIS PAPER WILL COST YOU JUST $75 33 — IT IS RATHER OLD YOU KNOW

NEW YORK.—Lawyers of this city who handle will cases requiring a search of early records lament the retirement of "Backnumber Joe," for he was their first-aid and searcher-in-chief in digging up facts from the archives.

"Backnumber Joe," despite his name, never lost touch with the events of the day. His specialty, though, was the accumulation of back numbers of newspapers, back numbers of magazines, back numbers of religious tracts, back numbers of comic supplements, and back numbers of almost anything that ever was printed.

Even if "Backnumber Joe" did not have the particular copy of an old newspaper needed by a lawyer who was straightening out a tangled suit, he always managed to get the desired publication in the course of a few days. How he did it was a trade secret for which he made his customers pay well.

His system of payment was the strangest feature of his novel business. He fixed the price he demanded by the age of the paper desired. "One penny a day from the date of publication, for any paper in the world, in addition to the original cost of the paper was his rule. It was a lucrative trade. A paper a year old, by this rule, was worth $3.65 above the original price; a paper two years old was worth $7.30, and a pated ten years old brought $36.50. And when it is borne in mind that very often he supplied newspapers 30, 50, or even 100 years old, the profits of the business are apparent.

As the fame of Joe grew among lawyers and antiquarians, he acquired more and more stock and needed larger quarters for it than he originally occupied in his little shop in Fulton street. For many years he stored his papers in a warehouse of his own somewhere on the West side of the city.

Her Babies' Entreaties Causes Woman to Steal

KANSAS CITY, Mo.—"Bring us some red coral beads, some red ribbon, some red sweaters, and a new dress, mamma," begged two little girls of Parsons, Kan., when their mother kissed them good-by the other morning to come to Kansas City on a shopping tour. To make sure that the mother would not forget they handed her a slip of paper on which they had written their wants. All the time she was shopping she carried that paper in her hand, looking at it every little while, until its entreaty had burned itself into her thoughts.

The words of her little daughters cut deeper and deeper, for she had come to the city with only enough money to supply long needed wants—money that her husband had given her to buy a dress. As she walked through some of the large department stores temptation came.

This is the story the mother told Capt. Charles Edwards of the Walnut street station. The watchful eye of a store detective had caught her and a companion who had come with her from Parsons, secreting goods under their cloaks. Their arrest and confessions followed. The mother had taken all that her children had asked for and more. In two suit cases that they confessed they had brought empty was found more than $100 worth of silks, scarfs, ribbons, jewelry and beads. These they had stolen by wrapping them as as the articles lay on the counter.

"I don't know now why I did it," the mother said, tearfully. "It seemed such an easy thing to do, and the things didn't look like they would be missed." Then she showed her daughters' note to the captain.

IN THE L[illegible]MELIGHT

MRS. LUND BOOMS "LITTLE FARM" PLAN.

Mrs. Haviland H. Lund of Los Angeles, Cal., one of the leading advocates of the "little farm" idea, is now in the east organizing local branches of the National Forward to the Land league.

One of the objects of the league is to purchase tracts of land on the outskirts of the big cities throughout the United States and subdivide them into one acre farms, to be equipped and turned over to the industrious poor.

Mrs. Lund has succeeded in interesting many prominent people, who have pledged their moral and financial support.

"I am of the opinion," said Mrs. Lund, "that our idea is one of the few logical solutions for the living problem of many of the big cities' poor. The plan has been in operation for several years near San Diego, Cal., and has proved successful in every way. The hearty interest your leading men and women seem to be taking in the cause certainly gives me great pleasure and encouragement.

"There is plenty of land in the vicinity of all large cities which will find its greatest productiveness under the efforts of the small tract farmer."

A. WENDELL JACKSON'S MIGHTY COUP

"Who's Jackson?"

Jackson? Why, he's the same person who financed China to her recent $50,000,000 loan when the so-called six-powers group of bankers representing Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Japan and the United States wouldn't lend the budding republic all this real money.

This new factor in world finance is a Massachusetts Yankee. His father was a seafaring man—no wonder the son's rovings around the world. Jackson was born in Chelsea, Mass., but he was only a boy of six when Jackson, Sr., decided to pioneer it to California. The family took ship to the Isthmus and the train across, and so made their way to California. The boy went to public school in San Francisco and then to high school—college was not in his thoughts. This in 1870. He later graduated from the University of California.

The story of how this adventurer in the higher realms of finance took the wind out of the sails of the proudest money magnates of the world is delicious. These gentlemen of the eminent six-power syndicate were busy telling China that the money she so badly needed could only be had by allowing them a say-so on how it was to be spent. China demurred.

The trouble was at its height, the bankers backing and filling, the diplomats in despair, when Jackson reached London. Here won big game. He promptly cabled to Peking that he could get the money on any terms suitable to China and China accepted.

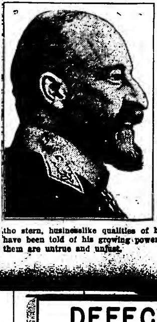
SIR EDWARD CARSON CALLED DICTATOR.

A remarkable pen-picture of Sir Edward Carson, the leader of the unionist "revolt" against home rule in Ulster, who in a short time has become one of the most talked of and powerful men in the United Kingdom, is contributed to the London Graphic by Philip Gibbs.

Mr. Gibbs, who as a descriptive journalist has made for himself a place something like that of the late G. W. Stevens, says in part:

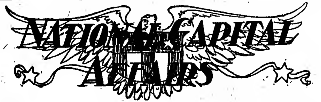
"Sir Edward Carson is the dictator of Ulster. * * * The people of Ulster, apart from that Catholic minority who on half-holidays may hang him in effigy on street lamp posts, are puppets who dance when he pulls the strings. At the word "Go" from him they would advance at quick step to any kind of danger, folly, and death. He can play upon their emotions as upon a fiddle with more than five strings, with fifty or a hundred thousand strings plucked from their hearts, and ready to quiver at the sound of that deep persuasive voice of his. He holds their hearts in the hollow of his hand."

KING FERDINAND NOW TAKEN SERIOUSLY



A calm observation of the effects of the Balkan war on the restless, suspicious "concert of Europe" leads to one illuminating conclusion. The map makers, national carpenters of the embassies, and the foreign ministries have at last decided to take seriously the men of the hour, Ferdinand, the tsar of the Bulgarians. No longer do you hear references to the "Tsarvenu"—the title which Sir Frederick Burnand and London Punch gave Ferdinand of Sofia in 1908.

His pictures are seen everywhere now—the bright "aiglon" eye; the sharp, Napoleonic nose; the firm mouth; thin lips and beard trimmed to a point. Ferdinand is the grandson of Louis Philippe of France, who was driven into exile by a quip and a partiality for curiosities in umbrellas which shocked the sensibilities of the fastidious Parisians. Necessarily a Bourbon, he is unlike the entire Bourbon line, inheriting the stern, businesslike qualities of his maternal ancestors. Many stories have been told of his growing power among the crowned heads. Most of them are untrue and unjust.



NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Diplomatic Circle Is Remarkable for Its Versatility

WASHINGTON.—Now that the seashore and mountains have practically closed their seasons and each steamship is bringing its quota of Americans from Europe, society in Washington is preparing for the season. Changes in the diplomatic corps fortunately will take from the capital only a few of its gifted and versatile members. Foreign governments have long made it a point to send to Washington gifted representatives. No sooner had Marchese Cusani, the Italian ambassador, been appointed to Washington than it became known that in his own country he had a reputation as a portrait painter. His portrait of the late King Humbert is regarded as a masterpiece. In the embassy are many products of his brush. Mr. James Bryce, the British ambassador, is, of course, one of the noted scholars and writers of the world.

These serious activities on the part of the elder diplomatists are balanced by the talents of the younger men and women in the foreign colony. Jonkheer Loudon, minister from the Netherlands, is an accomplished pianist and violinist. Mme. Loudon also is a brilliant musician and she has sung at many private entertainments. The members of the family of the Costa Rican minister and Mme. Calvo are versatile musicians, and their friends often have had the pleasure of hearing a recital by the younger ones.

Viscountess Benoist d'Azzy, wife of the naval attache of the French embassy, could easily make her living, should it be necessary, by fashioning novel favors for cotillions.

Another accomplished young member of the diplomatic circle is Mr. Heori Mertio, charge d'affaires of the Swiss embassy. He can write fantastic verse with the ease of a professional poet, can cut all sorts of fancy figures on ice or roller skates and can dance a clog with the finish of a vaudeville performer.

Has Not a Doubt That Man Came From a Monkey

"MAN cannot have arisen except from some more theroid (animal-like) form zoologically," it is declared in "Early Man in South America,"—just issued from the government printing office.

Ales Hrdlicka, curator of the division of physical anthropology of the National museum, is the author of the publication, which is known as "House of Representatives Document, No. 481."

"On the basis of what is positively known today in regard to early man, and with the present scientific views regarding man's evolution," Mr. Hrdlicka says in his report, "the anthropologist has a right to expect human bones, particularly crania, exceeding a few thousand years in age, and more especially those of geologic antiquity, shall present marked morphologic differences, and that these differences shall point in the direction of more primitive forms.

IT'S HARD TO BELIEVE WE DESCENDED FROM MONKEYS MONKEY

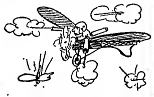
"No conclusion can be more firmly founded than that man is a product of an extraordinary progressive differentiation from some anthropomogenic stock, which developed somewhere in the later tertiary among the primates. He began then as an organism that in brain and body was less than man, that was an anthropoid. From this stage he could not become at once as he is today, though in some stages of his evolution he may have advanced by leaps, or at least more rapidly than in others. He must have developed successively morphologic modifications called for by his advance toward the present man, and have lost gradually those features that interfered with his advance or become useless—progress which is still unfinished."

Among other things that man lost on his way from monkey to man is a long and hairy tail. Mr. Hrdlicka does not say so, but he indicates it.

May Fight Battles in Air, Says General Wood



THAT it is the opinion of the military experts of this country that the aeroplane in the future will determine the victor of battle, whether on land or sea, was evidenced by a statement made the other day at the War college by Gen. Leonard Wood, chief of staff of the army, just prior to starting on his annual tour of inspection of the army posts.

"I wish it were possible," said General Wood, "for every officer in the army to make a flight in an aeroplane with the army aviators. I believe that by this means we could obtain enough officers willing to make a life study of the great possibilities of the aeroplane as an instrument of war—to make this country the foremost in the world in aviation. We were the first to recognize the possibilities of the aeroplane in warfare, but have been handicapped in furthering their study by the small numbers of officers willing to enter the aviation school. Other countries, following our lead, passed us in the application of the aeroplane to military science. They have a large corps of men studying every possible phase of the aeroplane in warfare.

"Our recent army maneuvers, in which the aeroplane was used extensively, proved that aviation is no longer an experiment, but a practical science. General Bliss in his report to me of the maneuvers states that the value of the aeroplane for scouting and bomb throwing purposes was clearly demonstrated."

WASHINGTON is known as the home of the man on "horseback," and it gets this somewhat unique title because of the number of equestrian statues in Washington. Most of the outdoor sculptures in the National capital are of a military order, and most of this statuary has been supplied by military organizations. And while these organizations may be powerful enough in hauling in the money they certainly do not know how to spend it artistically, for a greater lot of rubbish never littered up a city than these equestrian statues in Washington.

Among the soldiers of the Revolutionary war represented in the capital's squares and circles are Washington and Greene. Jackson and Scott belong to the period of 1812; the latter also to that of the Mexican war. Of Civil war leaders there is a far more plentiful supply, among them Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, McPherson, McClellan, Hancock and Logan, with Farragut and Dupont thrown in to represent the navy.

Another special military group is that of foreign soldiers in the Revolutionary war—Lafayette, Rochambeau, Von Steuben, Kosciusko and Pulaski, and, surrounding the Lafayette statue in Lafayette park, Rochambeau (again), Duportal, De Grosse and d'Estaing. Among the statesmen and jurists Franklin, Marshall, Webster and Garfield have memorials.

These memorials are all in addition to the contents of Statuary hall at the capitol, to which each state is entitled to contribute two figures. In that assemblage the whole gamut of merit is run, both in artistic representation and in historic distinction

FREE-HITTERS AND CHOKERS.

This world is divided between free-hitters and bat-chokers, but to understand the simile you must be a fan, or at least have the confidence of a fan who will lead you through the door of wisdom. The free-hitter, be it known, is the batsman of the supercilious eye who begins his swing away back over his shoulder, brings it round like a yacht's boom gibing in a strong wind and drives the ball over the left field fence or—misses it. He is the producer of home runs and three-baggers and is the recipient of adulation and automobiles. He is Speaker and Jackson and Doyle and the world-famous Casey. The bat-choker is different, says the New Orleans Times-Democrat. He is the man who slides his hand well down onto the swell of the bat, where, with a longer leverage, he can make a quick jab at the speeding sphere. He is content if he scratches a sacrifice or beats a bunt down to first. Nobody loves him, but he wins many a ball game, though even in the midst of victory he feels that the manager has the toboggan under him and is only waiting for a bonehead play to touch the trigger and send him to the minor league. The free-hitter also reaches the minors in due time, but he does so with head erect and chest expanded, for the free-hitter is such by nature and no reverse can quell him. Once a free-hitter always one.

Will the apple ever again become an article of common consumption? Or will it remain in the luxury list, somewhere, say, between truffles and bacon? There have been no eating apples within the range of any but the fattest pocketbook for many seasons, while the character of the pie apple is such as to require uncommon aptitude for the composition of the crust to make a pie fit to eat; or else the cost of the filling has required that the pie must be nearly all crust. A big crop is now in prospect and new orchards are coming to fruitage every season; such is the temptation of the soaring quotations, says the Providence Journal. At this juncture one of the orators at an apple growers' convention has the nerve to propose an advertising campaign, lest there be overproduction. Does not this proposal mean that the growers are determined to maintain prices as the supply increases? Something is said about instructing women in the theory that eating apples beautifies the complexion. That ought to create a market, to be sure. But there need be no fear of lack of demand. Apples will need no advertising if the price is right. And any artifice calculated to maintain high prices should be frowned upon by the hard-pressed consumer.

Recent investigations into the hours of work by officials of the French department of navigation have brought to light a record in government employment in the shape of an official whose daily "hours of duty" amount to exactly two minutes. This man dwells at a place on the Belgian frontier, and his arduous labors consist in fetching from one office a list of the number of barges that have entered French territory the previous twenty-four hours and handing the said list in at another office. If the position be a sinecure, the pay is not high, the remuneration amounting to $1.40 a month.

Excessive reading has the same effect as the opium habit, says a famous scientist. Must refer to campaign dope.

Still, the person who prophesied that war would be abolished because it would become too deadly might have had the aeroplane in mind.

New York.—Only the usual uncertainty of a few close states whose electoral vote in no way can affect the election of Wilson and Marshall, speculation over the popular vote of the three presidential candidates and the complexion of legislatures that will name United States senators had interest in the final returns of Tuesday's general election.

Wilson, it is now sure, has carried Illinois by a plurality of approximately 16,000, but the incomplete returns that drifted in slowly from the remote counties at the foot of the state, strong Democratic territory, continually increased the lead which Wilson held over Roosevelt.

THOMAS R. MARSHALL.

With 39 precincts still to be heard from, Wilson has a margin of 15,042 over Roosevelt. Nearly all the missing precincts are in Democratic sections, and when the judges and clerks of election get into their buckboards and ride to town with the returns, they are expected to swell Wilson's plurality still more.

Two States Change.

Wyoming, which had been counted in the Taft column, has passed to the Wilson column, and Vermont, which had been conceded to Wilson, is found to be for Taft.

Minnesota continued to grow stronger for Roosevelt, as returns from the agricultural precincts came in. Up to midnight Wednesday, Wilson was leading; since then Roosevelt has been ahead. His indicated plurality from the incomplete returns will be 15,000.

Completer returns increased Wilson's lead in Iowa. With all but five of the 99 counties in his plurality is 19,622.

Idaho also appears to have left the Taft column and gone into the Wilson one. Returns from four-fifths of the state seem to indicate that the New Jersey governor will have a small plurality in it, although a recount may be necessary to decide the result.

Wilson's plurality was wiped out, later Wilson crept ahead of Roosevelt, and then he fell back somewhat, and then another correction in the figures from Los Angeles county put Roosevelt ahead by 130 votes. Returns are still missing from 135 precincts in the mountains, and it is now believed that the vote will be so close that California may send a split delegation to the electoral college.

The electoral vote now indicates that Wilson has 442, Roosevelt 77, and Taft 12.

Democrats to Control Senate.

The absolute control of the senate in the Sixty-third congress now is practically assured to the Democrats. Conceding to the Republicans the legislatures of all states still in the doubtful column the Democrats will have a vote of 48, or just one-half of the entire membership of the senate, with a Democratic vice president in the chair to cast the deciding ballot in case of a tie. Six states are yet to be heard from definitely. A senator from one of these would give the Democrats a clear majority.

Kansas has been added to the Democratic column in the past 24 hours. The states in which the complexion of the legislatures is yet to be decided are: Illinois, Michigan, Oregon, South Dakota, Tennessee and Wyoming.

Ordinarily Tennessee could be relied upon to help the Democratic party, but the factional fight there may prevent in this crisis.

In Illinois there should be chosen a successor to the deposed Senator Lorimer, as well as Senator Cullom, whose term expires on the fourth of next March.

If there should be no election the effect would favor the Democrats by reducing the membership of the senate to 94, of which number the 48 already chosen would be a working majority. Whatever the outcome in any of the states mentioned, there can be no doubt as to the Democratic control of the senate.

In addition to the aid of the vice president in an emergency, they will find willing co-operation among the Progressive senators. Three or four of the Progressives are almost as liberal in their tariff views and on other questions as the Democrats themselves. Senators Clapp, La Follette, Cummins, Gronna, Bristow and Poindexter are all avowed tariff reformers. They also favor advanced legislation on other subjects. Senator Works announced his intention of voting for the Democratic presidential candidate some time before the election.

Of the 31 hold-over Republicans, eight have been classed as Progressive Republicans in the past. They are Bristow of Kansas, Crawford of South Dakota, Cummins of Iowa, Gronna of North Dakota, Clapp of Minnesota, La Follette of Wisconsin, Poindexter of Washington and Works of California.

The new president-elect Woodrow Wilson has not as yet decided upon the personnel of his future cabinet and he intends to keep his mind open on the subject for a long time before he takes office. He was manifestly concerned about certain speculations emanating from Princeton with respect to the probable makeup of his cabinet. To put an end, if possible, to all gossip about cabinet appointments he issued the following statement:

"Such speculations are perfectly fruitless. I mean to keep my mind entirely open with regard to appointments of the first consequence until a final announcement is possible. It will be perfectly useless to resort to me for corroboration of any report, because I shall have absolutely nothing to announce. No announcement will have the least authority that is not made over my own signature. These are matters which must be determined by very deliberate counsel and not by gossip."

Woman's Suffrage Gains.

A phase of the general election that became known yesterday was the success of women's suffrage in four of the five states where constitutional amendments were submitted to the people.

Wilson's Popular Vote Enormous.

Estimates of the popular vote polled by Governor Wilson ranged through many millions during the day. It was found impossible to compute, with any accuracy, the popular vote of any of the presidential candidates and it will be a number of days until the counting of the three cornered contest in the different states is concluded and an accurate tabulation of the popular vote made possible.

Assertions were made from several quarters where an effort had been made to gather preliminary popular vote figures, that Governor Wilson had not secured a majority of the votes cast throughout the country. Estimates ranged from a small majority of all votes to figures nearly 1,000,000 below a majority. The popular votes, however, would in no way effect his election, or his complete control of the electoral college, should it show his total to be less than that of the combined vote for Roosevelt and Taft.

HIS EXCELLENCY, THE PRESIDENT-ELECT.

In Republican Strongholds.

Two in Colorado, where John F. Shafroth (Dem.) for the full term and C. S. Thomas (Dem.) for the short term, will be selected by a Democratic legislature. One in Montana, where Republicans and Progressives conceded the election of T. J. Walsh (Dem.). One in Kansas, where W. R. Stubbs (Rep.) conceded the election of his opponent, Wm. H. Thompson (Dem.). One in Delaware, a Democratic legislature assuring the return of a Democrat to succeed Richardson (Rep.) retired. One in New Jersey, where Wm. Hughes (Dem.) will succeed Briggs (Rep.)

The uncertainty as to West Virginia, indicated in earlier reports, seemed apparently the only obstacle to a Democratic majority.

Definite returns are still lacking from Oregon, Wyoming, Tennessee, New Hampshire, Illinois, Iowa and South Dakota. Late figures from Nevada indicate that Pittman (Dem.) is leading and probably is elected.

Joe Cannon Is Defeated.

Later returns did not diminish the heavy Democratic majority in the house of representatives, but they did play see-saw with "Uncle Joe" Cannon and finally left him defeated by a majority of 600.

Gillette of Massachusetts probably will succeed to Cannon's position as senior Republican on the appropriations committee.

The personnel of the new senate will show many of the veterans, with a large infusion of new blood. Among the prominent senators holding over are Root, Lodge, La Follette, Gallinger, Penrose, Clapp, Culberson, Kern, O'Gorman, Rayner, Shively and Hoke Smith.

Others re-elected or likely to come back include Senators Bacon, Tillman, Borah, Nelson, Simmons, Martin, Bankhead, Davis and Owens.

Among those who failed of renomination and whose names will not appear on the senate rolls after the 4th of March is Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois, whose congressional career goes back to the time of Abraham Lincoln. Included in this list are also Senators Curtis of Kansas; Bourne of Oregon and Gamble of South Dakota.

Senators Bailey of Texas; Crane of Massachusetts; Guggenheim of Colorado; Richardson of Delaware; Burnham of New Hampshire and Wetmore of Rhode Island retire voluntarily. Each refused to stand for reelection.

New Faces in Senate.

Whatever its political complexion there will be many new faces in the senate of the next congress. Among the most prominent of the new men who already have been chosen are Ollie James of Kentucky and Joseph E. Ransdell of Louisiana, both present members of the house and both Democrats.

Mr. James succeeds Senator Paynter and Mr. Ransdell Senator Murphy J. Foster. Former Governor Vardaman comes as the successor of Senator Leroy Percy of Mississippi and former Representative Wm. Hughes as the successor to Senator Briggs of New Jersey.

Representative G. W. Norris of Nebraska probably will succeed Senator Norris Brown. Colorado will be represented by its present governor, John F. Shafroth, who probably will succeed Mr. Guggenheim and by former Governor Charles S. Thomas, who probably will be elected to fill the unexpired term of the late Charles J. Hughes.

Senator Dixon of Montana who has given his time to Colonel Roosevelt's campaign is in the doubtful list with the chances against him.

WILSON'S ADVISORS.

Material for the Democratic Cabinet Being Discussed.

Washington, D. C. — Cabinet makers are already busy conjuring with names of those who will share with Wilson in shaping the policy of the next administration. Necessarily this is purely gossip, but the cabinet builders are none the less active in pointing out the persons and the elements available as cabinet material.

One of the available elements embraces those who were conspicuous party figures at the Baltimore convention, including Speaker Clark, Chairman Underwood of the ways and means committee, Wm. J. Bryan, Governor Foss of Massachusetts, Governor Harmon of Ohio and some others. It is generally assumed, however, that Speaker Clark and Chairman Underwood would prefer to continue their work in congress, especially now that the legislative program on the tariff and other questions is likely to meet with fewer obstacles.

Another element from which cabinet material is being suggested embraces those who have been prominently identified with the Wilson campaign, notably Chairman McCombs of the Democratic national committee, Representatives Burleson and Henry of Texas, Representative Palmer of Pennsylvania, Assistant Chairman McAdoo and a number of others who bore the brunt of the conflict at Baltimore and during the campaign.

Sulzer's Plurality 150,000.

New York, Nov. 7.—New York state went Democratic in practically every branch of its government. Congressman William Sulzer was elected governor by a plurality estimated at 150,000 over the nearest opponent, Job E. Hedges, Republican. The legislature will be strong Democratic in both branches, according to indications. Congressman Sulzer received a plurality of the popular vote not only in the Democratic strongholds of New York city, but also in the up-state districts.

Wireless Election News to 15,000.

San Francisco, Nov. 8.—Fifteen thousand persons on board 50 steamships on the Pacific ocean, received election returns by wireless Tuesday from stations in this city. The first wireless election bulletin was flashed at 8 o'clock and the operator had hardly closed his key upon the news that Wilson had more than enough electoral votes to win before the operator on the Pacific Mail liner Nile, just entering the port of Honolulu from the Orient, "O. Tariff Revision Program.

Birmingham, Ala., Nov. 8. — Bills have been drafted and others are now being drafted looking to the general revision of the tariff downward. These bills will be considered at the special session of congress expected to be called next spring. Just as soon as Gov. Goodrow Wilson of New Jersey has been inaugurated president March 4 next he will have under consideration the calling of an extra session of congress, the general purpose of which will be to take up tariff revision. This is the program set

A Dual Personality.

St. Louis, Nov. 8. — Miss Barbara Gladys Arnold, 17-year-old nurse who confessed she set fire to the Berlin hotel, causing the loss of four lives, said that a dual personality caused her to commit the crime and that when a realization of its horror came to her something seemed to tell her the only way to atone would be to start a second fire and perish in it. This, she said, was what prompted her to set fire to the Wiedemern hotel shortly before her arrest.

Wilson Issues Statement.

Princeton, N. J., Nov. 7.—President-elect Wilson has just dictated a post election statement which follows in part: "The result gives us hope that the thoughtful voters of the nation may now at last unite to give the country freedom and enterprise and a government released from selfish and arrogant influences, devoted to justice and progress. There is absolutely nothing for the honest and enlightened business man of the country to fear."

REGULATING THE STOMACH

That Important Organ Works According to the Quality of the Blood That Is Furnished to It.

There is the most intimate relation between the condition of the blood and the activity of the stomach. The blood depends upon the stomach for a large part of its nourishment; while every act of digestion, from the time the food enters the stomach until it is digested and assimilated by the blood, needs plenty of pure, well-oxidized blood. The stomach works only according to the quality of the blood.

The most common cause of indigestion is anæmia, or lack of blood. Indeed there is not a single disturbance of the health of the body nor any form of exhaustion or lowered vitality, that may not lead to stomach trouble. Disordered blood is the one common cause of indigestion. Thin, impure blood weakens the muscles of the stomach and lessens the product of the glands which furnish the digestive fluids.

Nothing will more promptly cure indigestion than plenty of pure, well-oxidized blood. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People increase the red corpuscles, the oxygen-carriers of the blood, until the blood is rich and red. A thorough trial of these pills gives a hearty appetite, perfect digestion, strength and health.

Mrs. Emma M. Meyne, of No. 635 Second avenue, Clinton, Iowa, says: "I had just worked myself out bringing up a family of five children and, while in this run-down condition, I took sick with some kind of stomach trouble. I doctored with several physicians and saw a specialist in Chicago but received little help. I could not eat anything with relish and could not sleep. I would have deathly sick spells and would vomit. I had terrible headaches and dizzy spells. I got very thin and my friends thought I was going into consumption. I doctored for a year or so without help. While visiting a niece she told me that she took Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People; so I tried them. They soon helped me and a few boxes entirely cured me."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50c. per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Escaped the Worst of It.

The worst things are the afflictions that have never happened. Bobby had just been soundly spanked for falling into the creek. "Gee!" he exclaimed, rubbing the seat of punishment, "what wouldn't I have got if I had drowned."

WESTERN CANADA'S PROSPERITY

NOT A BOOM, BUT DUE TO NATURAL DEVELOPMENT.

One of the largest banks in Holland has been doing a big business in Western Canada, and Mr. W. Westermen, the President, on a recent visit into the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, expressed himself as being much impressed with present conditions and prospects, and was convinced that the great prosperity of the Dominion was not a boom, but merely the outcome of natural developments.

Not only has money been invested largely in Western Canada by the Holland Banks, but by those of Germany, France, as well as Great Britain. Not only are these countries contributing money, but they are also contributing people, hard headed, industrious farmers, who are helping to produce the two hundred million bushels of wheat and the three hundred million bushels of the other small grains that the Provinces of the West have harvested this season.

During the past fiscal year there came into Canada from the United States 133,710; from Austria Hungary 21,651; from Belgium 1,601; Holland 1,077; France 2,094; Germany 4,664; Sweden 2,394; Norway 1,692; and from all countries the immigration to Canada in that year was 354,237. From the United States and foreign countries the figures will be increased during the present year.

Most of these people have gone to the farms, and it is no far look to the time when the prophecy will be fulfilled of half a billion bushel crop of wheat in Western Canada. Advertisement.

TIRED BLOOD LOWERS VITALITY

(Copyright 1912 by the Tonitives Co.)

Nutriment and Oxygen absorbed by the blood from the food we eat, and the air we breathe feeding the living cells, produces vitality. When the blood is tired, it fails to provide these elements in sufficient quantities, and we suffer from Lack of Strength, Lack of Endurance, Broken Down Constitution, Worried or Depressed State of Mind, etc. In order to maintain vitality the blood should be rich with nutriment and red with oxygen. A treatment of Tonitives is the surest method of accomplishing these results. 75c. per box of dealers or by mail. The Tonitives Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

FIRST REAL STORY OF TURKISH DEFEAT

London War Correspondent, Working in Disguise, Gives the News to the World.

SULTAN'S ARMIES WIPED OUT

Forty Thousand Have Been Slain in Fierce Battles, Almost All the Artillery Captured, and Thousands Made Prisoners—Complete Military Disaster.

London, Nov. 6.—The world has had but meager details of the terrific fighting between the Turks and the allied Balkan states. A strict military censorship, and the fact that correspondents have not been permitted to accompany any of the armies in the field, have been responsible for keeping the world in ignorance of these details.

Martin H. Donahue, war correspondent of the London Chronicle, in the guise of a medical assistant of the Red Cross workers, witnessed the terrible battle in Thrace, resulting in one of the most disastrous defeats known to modern warfare. To escape the Turkish censors Mr. Donahue sent his story by automobile from Thorfu to Constantinople, and from there by boat to Constanza, Roumania, from where it was cabled to London. His story of the battle is as follows:

"Irrevocable disaster has broken the Turkish army. It has suffered an appalling defeat. This has been followed by confusion and a rout for which there is scarcely a parallel in history—a rout which in its later stages degenerated into a wild panic, a stampede, which communicated itself to the whole fighting force.

"As I am writing this dispatch the army corps forming Abdullah Pasha's splendid army lie battered and decimated, and the defensive lines have fled pell-mell before the advancing Bulgarians.

Defeat Is Like Sedan.

"It has been the most complete military disaster since Mukden, the greatest debacle since Sedan. Forty thousand men, the flower of the Turkish troops, have fallen, while Abdullah Pasha himself narrowly escaped their fate. Seventy-five per cent of his artillery was captured. His men seemed to melt away like snow before the summer sun.

"After the disintegration began it soon became general; brigades dissolved into regiments, regiments into companies, and the companies became small groups until all cohesion disappeared and the demoralization became complete. By handfuls the remnants of the army have found their way back to Tchorlu, the Bulgarian artillery cruelly harassing them, mowing them down in thousands.

"The Bulgarians, advancing in large numbers, strongly supported by their artillery, speedily drove back the Turks, who retired in the direction of Lule Burgas. Throughout the terrible fighting the superiority of the Bulgarian artillery was pronounced. The Turks were unable to stand the murderous fire and withdrew slowly.

"The gunners being dead and a majority of the horses being killed, the artillery was forced to abandon guns to the enemy. The Bulgarians, who displayed extraordinary energy, pressed forward, determined to make the most of their advantage.

Shelled From Lule Burgas.

"By the afternoon the Bulgarians had shelled the Turks out of Lule Burgas.

"Fortunately the inhabitants had fled and the loss of life among noncombatants was small. Having effectually silenced the fire of the Turks, the Bulgarians launched an infantry attack, which stormed the town at the point of the bayonet.

"The greater part of the Turkish garrison had already withdrawn, but the men of the rear guard were caught like rats in a trap. The soldiers of the fourth corps, although they had been without food for two days, offered a stubborn but unavailing resistance. They died to a man.

Sees Troops Slaughtered.

"The Turkish commander in chief had watched the fight from the heights near the village of Satikeui, due east of Lule Burgas. As he observed the Turkish artillery and infantry being mowed down his face grew grave. The Turkish artillery had from the beginning been poorly supplied with ammunition. What it had was practically expended in the morning fight, and now many gunners stood around the empty limbers with folded arms.

"Unable to reply to the Bulgarian fire they awaited death, which came swiftly, with true Ottoman courage.

"Along the whole Turkish front the troops were harrassed by a terrible fire. As time went on it became simply a carnage, men falling in hundreds. The morale of the troops was completely destroyed by the appalling shell fire. When night closed in on the decimated Turks it brought only a short respite to Abdullah Pasha's army from shot and shell. The men badly needed sleep and food, but the Turkish commissariat was nonexistent.

Chase Starving Turks.

"No food was there and sleep was impossible, as the pursuing Bulgarians were endowed with relentless force and energy. Turkish dead and wounded lay everywhere and encumbered the ground in all directions.

"Surgeons were few and ambulances absolutely none. The dead lay where they had fallen. Some attempt was made to remove and succor the wounded, but the greater portion perished miserably in the bitter cold of the night.

"For an hour the retreat was in good order, but subsequently, pressed by the mass behind, the vanguard speedily lost all semblance to an organized army. The men abandoned haversacks and rifles, all equipment.

"Two hours after sunrise the Bulgarians obtained information of what was happening in the ranks of Abdullah Pasha's army and started in pursuit. Thenceforward the retreat was a disorderly rout. Sakizkoj was speedily occupied by the Bulgarians, practically without a shot being fired. The Turks' baggage, guns, equipment and all their military stores fell into the hands of the Bulgarians.

Tries to Flank Bulgars.

"The only ray of hope throughout the long and bitter day of disaster and death was obtained by the partial success of the right wing, under Mukhtar Pasha. While the left wing and the center were being fiercely assailed Mukhtar Pasha, under the orders of Abdullah Pasha, essayed a counter attack. The Turkish right sought to turn the Bulgarian left and there was desperate fighting between Mukhtar Pasha's troops and the Bulgars on Istrandja Heights until night closed in.

"On Wednesday the full strength of the Bulgarian army was hurled against the Turkish left, it being the weakest point of the entire defensive line. Abdullah Pasha's losses had been enormous and the Bulgarians were determined to force the Turkish left center at any cost. In this effort a feeble reply was made by the Turkish artillery, and efforts were made to send munitions and provisions to the threatened flank. The transportation was inefficient, and no food forthcoming for the starving, rapidly dwindling army fighting for its life, fresh ground was again and again conceded, and the First corps, which had been holding on grimly in the neighborhood of Tukbej on the northeast of Lule Burgas, was driven out early on Wednesday afternoon, its retreat eastward strewn with dead and dying.

"Its commander implored Abdullah Pasha to send reinforcements and ammunition, saying that he had come to his last cartridges, and his magazines were empty.

Wounded Are Unaided.

"The ambulance wagons had broken down, the horses being missing or shot. Consequently those wounded who could walk were left to shift for themselves, limping forward, usually with gaping shell wounds in the head or upper part of the body. Seventy-five per cent of the wounded had been hit by shrapnel. This bears out eloquent testimony to the murderous precision of the Bulgarian artillery.

"In the darkness of the night, the Turkish commander pursued his way toward Karisoirian, a small village ten miles to the southeast of his old headquarters, in the vain hope of yet saving his army by stemming the retreat of the center.

"Abdullah Pasha may have been actuated by the best intention, but his action was the worst possible step, and it brought disaster. The climax came at three o'clock on Thursday morning. When the Turkish left wing learned of the disappearance of its commander it needed little for the panic-stricken soldier to fire his rifle and shout 'Bulgarians coming' to complete the confusion.

Army's Fate Settled.

"Chaos reigned. The general cry of 'Sauve qui peut' followed. In the darkness of the wintry morning the whole army broke away and made a concerted bolt for the road leading to the rear. Horses, stores, arms, everything was abandoned. Officers mixed pell-mell with the men, and carried away the rear guard in their rush.

"Wednesday settled the fate of Abdullah's army. His force could no longer fight. It had neither ammunition for the guns nor food to sustain the soldiers. Their pitiable plight brought to light every moment the hideous defects of the Turkish army organization. It had occupied the capital lines of battle with a great flourish of trumpets, but it was ill prepared for the Hurculean task before it of conquering the highly trained and efficient Bulgarians."

Two of a Kind.

"The most important question in marriage is whether the young women can keep house."

"One quite as important is whether the young men can supply the house to keep."

The Real Kind.

"A girl don't know her own mind about marriage. First, it's yes and then it's no."

"I beg your pardon. First, it's yes and then it's Reno."

Economic Agility.

A kitten knows how to manage economically."

"How do you mean?"

"When a kitten wants to make both ends meet all she has to do is to chase her tail."

His Only One.

"What makes you think Biggins didn't get himself the string of fish he brought home?"

Poor Spelling as a Lure.

The critical eye of a conscientious orthographer was attracted by the sign above a Third avenue luncheon, and he went in to set the proprietor right. "Yes," said the lunchroom man, "I know 'sandewiches' is wrong, but you see that sign attracts a lot of 'smart Alecks' into the store who want to teach me how to spell and after they come they usually stop long enough to order something. What'll yours be?"—New York Tribune.

Man Need Help—Not Charity.

There is a higher duty than to build almshouses for the poor, and that is to save men from being degraded to the blighting influence of an almshouse. Man has a right to something more than bread to keep him from starving. He has a right to the aids and encouragements and culture, by which he may fulfill the destiny of a man, and until society is brought to recognize and reverence this it will continue to groan under its present miseries.—Channing.

BACKACHE AND ACHING JOINTS

Together Tell of Bad Kidneys

Much pain that masks as rheumatism is due to weak kidneys—to their failure to drive off uric acid thoroughly.

AN OKLAHOMA CASE.

John T. Jones, 213 S. Pile St., Pauls Valley, Okla., says: "I was confined to bed for days with kidney trouble and sciatic rheumatism. I was weak and debilitated and tormented almost to death. Not improving under the doctor's treatment, I began using Doan's Kidney Pills and was entirely cured. I have had no trouble since."

House Plans Important.

The care in the home and all other forms of household work are greatly facilitated by right planning and the use of suitable materials for the construction and furnishing of the home. An adequate and convenient water supply and other conveniences are essential, not only for comfort and for saving labor, but also from the standpoint of home hygiene.

Truth About Old Age.

"I agree with Professor Metchnikoff about the wisdom of the old. Professor Osler made it fashionable to decry gray hairs, but my experience has been that the old not only possess wisdom, but they seek it also."

With a smile Mr. Baer added:

"The only people who think they are too old to learn are those who really are too young."

Fashion Note.

Lady Duff Gordon, at a tea at the Ritz-Carlton, praised the pannier skirt.

"Everybody likes it, it is so graceful," she said, smiling. "Everybody likes it except crusty old fellows."

She turned to a crusty old fellow upon a Louis Seize chair beside her and continued:

"I know a woman whose husband growled at her when she tried on a new pannier gown for him:

"'I don't see why you wear those ridiculous big panniers. You haven't got the hips to fill them.'

"The woman blushed and bit her lip. Then she said quietly:

"'But do you fill your silk hat, George?'"

FRIGHTFUL HANDICAP.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

"Steenerson, Steenerson, vad vil du ha?" 15,000 majority ja, ja, ja, and he got it ja, ja, ja.

There has been some bitter things said and published during the congressional campaign in this district, but all should remember that neither side did all the mud slinging. That paper called the Eye Opener, published at Crookston is a disgrace to its owners and the party it represents, and will do the Socialist party more harm than good, in the future.

It may be alright for a gang of low down saloon blackguards to buy a newspaper outfit to air their feelings in but that kind of argument don't go in any more campaigns, since the Sagan deal was sprung on the Steenerson supporters. If its mud throwing they want, that is what they must expect to get back, as the Steenerson supporters can throw mud when it begins to fly from the other direction.

A table compiled from the latest official and unofficial returns from all states shows the total vote in the United States as follows: Wilson 6, 296, 997. Roosevelt 4, 315, 805. Taft 3,350,864. Wilsons plurality over Roosevelt 2,083, 192, Roosevelts plurality over Taft 964,941,—Crookston Daily Times,

Taft carried three states, getting 12 Electoral votes, They were mountainous state where the people are in the shade of mountains for a good portion of the time. Of course Utah might have been expected to go for Taft as a man that has from six to 20 wives to look after dont have much time to study politics,

Taft in making his statement acknowledging Wilsons election says:—

"The vote for Mr. Roosevelt, the third party candidate and for Mr Debs, the Socialist candidate, is a warning that their propaganda in favor of fundamental changes in our constitutional representative government has formidable support."

You bet your life Wm, they are camping on the trail of any man that denies a constitutional representative government to the people, and if Wilson attempts to follow your methods in this respect he will take a swifter walk out of that chair four years from now than you did, this time.

The standing of the house of representatives in the new congress follows: Democrats, 279; republicans, 118; progressives, 12; districts unreported, 26.

The progressive party did not do bad this year for a new born infant. Came out second in the presidential race and landed 12 men in Congress, besides we claim one half interest in Steenerson, which makes us 12½.

Hard Headed.

"Stella is going to cooking school."

"Does she intend to be married?"

"I think not."

"But I thought she was spending all her time on [illegible]."

"She was, but she says cooks draw more wages and take fewer insults than [illegible]."

Porto Rico's New Wonder.

From far away Porto Rico come reports of a wonderful new discovery that is believed will vastly benefit the people. Ramon T. Marchan, of Barceloneta, writes" Dr. King's New Discovery is doing splendid work here, It cured me about five times of terrible coughs and colds, also my brother of a severe cold in his chest and more than 20 others, who used it on my advice. We hope this great medicine will yet be sold in every drug store in Porto Rico, " For throat and lung troubles it has no equal, A trial will convince you of its merit, 50c and $1,00, Trial bottle free. FIREPROOF BUILDINGS.

Many people think that the term "fireproof" is a misnomer, that there is no such thing as a fireproof building and that the use of the term gives one too great a sense of security. This attitude has been brought about largely by the destruction or serious damages of certain buildings that were supposed to have been fireproof and by the fact that many persons think because a building is fireproof it should in some occult fashion prevent the contents from burning.

It is a matter of record that where buildings called fireproof have been destroyed they have been found to have violated some fundamental principle of the really fireproof building.

A fireproof building must be considered apart from its contents, for the structure itself can in no way prevent the burning of combustible material within it except the spread of fire. It is true that as yet we have not attained the absolutely fireproof building, since even the best fireproofing material we have today is somewhat damageable by fires, but we can and do erect structures that are practically fireproof.

The term "fireproof" in building construction means a capability of withstanding fire without being materially damaged. A fireproof building, therefore, may be defined as one that is capable of having its contents cremated without material impairment structurally. That is, all burnable material may be destroyed, but the structure itself will remain intact, requiring only the replacement of some of the fireproofing and the interior finish to make it again ready for occupancy.—F. F. Walther in Engineering Magazine.

THE CRAVING FOR FOOD.

Man Eats Because He's Hungry, Not For Scientific Reasons.

In an article in the Popular Science Monthly Professor W. B. Cannon of the Harvard Medical school writes: "'Why do we eat?' This question, presented to a group of educated people, is likely to bring forth the answer, 'We eat to compensate for body waste or to supply the body with fuel for its labors.' Although the body is in fact losing weight continuously and drawing continuously on its store of energy and although the body must periodically be supplied with fresh material and energy in order to keep a more or less even balance between the income and the outgo, this maintenance of weight and strength is not the motive for taking food.

"Primitive man and the lower animals may be regarded as quite unacquainted with notions of the equilibrium of matter and energy in the body, and yet they take food and have an efficient existence in spite of this ignorance. In nature generally important processes, such as the preservation of the individual and the continuance of the race, are not left to be determined by intellectual considerations, but are provided for in automatic devices. Natural desires and impulses arise in consciousness, driving us to action, and only by analysis do we learn their origin or divine their significance. Thus our primary reasons for eating are to be found not in convictions about metabolism, but in the experiences of appetite and hunger."

Table All Right.

"Do they have a good table?" asks the prospective guest.

"It is first rate," answers the man who has just returned—"solid oak, with heavy legs and a polished top."—Judge.

A Question of Gifts.

"Why did you deliberately make an enemy of your old friend Jinks?"

"Because he is to be married next month."—Lippincott's.

SLEEPING IN CHURCH.

It Used to Be Rudely Interrupted in Olden Times in England.

One John Rudge is on record as having bequeathed to the parish of Trysull, in Shropshire, England, 20 shillings a year to be paid to "a poor man" employed to go about church in summer to keep people awake.

At another English church, that at Acton, in Cheshire, it was the practice during the middle of the last century for one of the churchwardens to proceed through the church during service with a huge wand in his hand, wherewith if any one of the congregation were observed to be asleep he was instantly awakened by a tap on the head.

In Warwickshire a similar custom prevailed. A warden bearing a stout wand shaped like a hay fork at the end stepped stealthily up and down the nave and the aisles, and whenever he saw an individual asleep he touched him so effectively that the nap was broken, this being sometimes accomplished by the application of the fork to the nape of the neck.

A more playful method obtained in another church. The beadle went about during service carrying a long staff, to one end of which was attached a fox's brush and to the other a knob. With the former he gently tickled the faces of the women sleepers, while with the knob he bestowed a sharp rap on the heads of male offenders.—Exchange.

ORIENTALS APT PUPILS.

It Doesn't Take Them Long to Get the Swing of Our Ways.

About the time the Japanese or Siamese student at Harvard has come to know his way about the campus he has forgotten to prefix "honorable" to the names of professors, he remembers only dimly that he used to salaam to his elders, and he wears a cap with as careless grace and comfort as any other freshman.

If six weeks will make such transformation in the oriental six months will so change him that even his father would have difficulty in recognizing him at first glance. And he can say, "You get me, Harold, don't you, old boy?" and "Let's beat it!" as readily as though he were Boston born.

A tutor over in Cambridge takes oriental students in charge as soon as they arrive at the university and instructs them in the ways and means of acquiring a working knowledge of English. It makes no difference whether the youngsters had any education in the English language or not before they left home.

The Chinese or the Japanese student, the tutor says, is invariably quick, determined and eager to learn. Also, according to this tutor, he unlearns a lot of oriental things.—Boston Herald.

How to Boil Water.

To boil water would seem to be a very simple thing, and yet the late Charles Delmonico used to say that very few people knew how to do it. "The secret is," he said, "in putting good fresh water into a clean kettle already quite warm and setting the water to boiling quickly and then taking it right off for use in tea, coffee or other drinks before it is spoiled. To let it steam and simmer and evaporate until the good water is in the atmosphere and the lime and iron and dregs only left in the kettle is what makes a great many people sick, and it is worse than no water at all." For water boiled like this and flavored with a few drops of lemon juice Mr. Delmonico use to charge as much as for his best liquors, and he often recommended it to his customers and friends who complained of loss of appetite.

A Bold but Unprofitable Retort.

"I passed that woman in the second floor apartment downtown this afternoon with a wonderful new French hat on, and she had her chin up so high in the air she couldn't see any one she knew," said Mrs. Knox, with a tinge of resentment in her voice, as she began to pave the way to inform her husband that her own old awning was looking disgracefully shabby and ready for the church rummage sale.

Then he suddenly remembered that he had an engagement and decided this was as good a time as any to keep it.—Kansas City Star.

Didn't Sound Right.

"Ma, what does d d stand for?"

"Doctor of divinity, my dear. Don't they teach you the common abbreviations in school?"

"Oh, yes, but that doesn't seem to sound right here."

"Read it out loud, my dear."

My Dear (reading)—"Witness—I heard the defendant say, 'I'll make you suffer for this; I'll be doctor of divinity if I don't.'"—Milwaukee Sentinel.

His Kind Heart.

Squire Hornbottle—For a married man you seem to have a lot of time to loaf around the depot and stores.

Newt Neversweat—You see, squire, I'm so soft hearted it breaks me all up to sit around the house and watch my wife work so hard.—Washington Times.

Flagged Train With Shirt.

Tearing his shirt from his back an Ohio man flagged a train and saved it from a wreck, but H. T. Alston, Raleigh, N C,, once prevented a wreck with Electric Bitters. "I was in a terrible plight when I began to use them," he writes, "my stomach, head, back and kidneys were all badly affected and my liver was in bad condition, but four bottles of Electric Bitters made me feel like a new man," A trial will convince you of their matchless merit for any stomach, liver or kidney trouble. Order of the Dragon.

There is at least one order of American officers that congress has recognized to the extent of permitting the members to wear the badge with their uniform on proper occasions. This is the Order of the Dragon, established by commissioned officers of the army at Peking in 1900. The members are commissioned officers of the American army and navy who served in China during the Boxer troubles, and there are honorary members from other armies and navies which took part in the campaign of the allies. The society is similar in some ways to the Order of the Cincinnati, founded by French and American officers at the close of the American Revolution, the object of the society being to perpetuate friendships formed during the war.—New York Sun.

Stone Miseries.

The decay of building stones, according to more than one authority, is not due to wind action or other surface influence, but to internal disintegration resembling wood rot, and this is ascribed by some to a low organism like the fungi and the molds that cause the decay of vegetable substances.

A cure has been found for the stone disease, or at least a form of treatment that diminishes its ravages. The stones are treated with germicides, the best of which appears to be a mixture of sulphate of copper solution with bichloride of mercury and creosote.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

THE LOCAL NEWS.

We have a fine farm for sale in Deer Park township for only $21 per acre.

The plowing season has closed down until April 1st.

County surveyor C. H. Martz was up yesterday looking over county ditches.

The state ditches are making it a difficult matter to get around the country until the culverts are put in.

Carl and Bennie Narveson have been busy stacking the flax crop on the Simon Solberg farm this week.

Willie Parno, returned home this week and will farm on his homestead east of Erie this winter. Willie reports a successful seasons work with over three hundred dollars made this season.

Knut Dale had the misfortune to have the eccentrics slip on the old Pitts engine this week, and had to refit and fix up his old Minnesota Giant Engine.

The completion of the farmers Elevator at Oklee will cause a a large amount of grain from this territory to seek a market at that point.

FOR SALE: Four No. 1 work oxen. Powerful, young, and well broke. Also one cow, will be sold cheap, if taken at once Inquire of S.L.Holmn, at Highlanding Minn.

Knut Nelson was getting too old to lug both Taft and Eberhart into office in this state, but he carried Adolph through alright, but Taft was so heavy that he had to drop him by the wayside.

The Ole Giving threshing machine has been pushing threshing operations quite rapidly on the north side of the river this week P. C. Wold, Henry Arnt and Vaughn Bros and Co, have got their threshing done and Chris Narverson will have his finished today. The machine goes from there to Ole Oversons and then to Parno's.

The work on ditch 58 is being pushed rapidly and with fair weather this ditch will be completed this fall, so the people on the south side can say they have got one ditch. They have two steam dredges digging now and the boys that are running them understand their business, so they make them moving dredges instead of setters.

Some of the Republican County officers are justly indignant over the fact that two of their Committee man betrayed their trust during the Campaign and dropped out of line to support Candidates of other parties. Such tactics deserve the contempt of honorable men and unprincipled cusses of that kind will surely get their just dues at some future date, in this county, with the men that they supported.

An amusing story comes from McIntosh regarding the congressional fight which runs something like this: After the speech of Brattland some of the boys heard some one hollering and an investigation found Bratt and with his head stuck into a dry goods box hollering " Hon. M.A. Brattland, Congressman from the 9th Congressional District of Minnesota, elected by the Public Ownership party !" but that is as far as he ever got, was election, in his mind.

A CARD OF THANKS.

Thief River Falls, Minn.
Nov. 8, 1912.

I wish to thank my supporters for the splendid vote I received at the General Election, in every precinct of the County. I consider this vote an endorsement of my work as County Treasurer,

Very Sincerely Yours,
Andrew Trovaton.

We understand that a special election will be called in the 5th District to elect a County Commissioner, as Mandt and Leimers tied, at the general Election. We understand there will be something doing from the republican side this time to hold the party in line to elect Mandt. Both are good men for the position, but when men that are on the Republican committee jump outside the party after candidates, it is time for the other side to sit up and take notice.

Doesn't Like to Move.

A most curious and sluggish creature is the tantawa, a nine inch lizard whose home is in New Zealand. This little imitation saurian has the reputation of being the laziest creature ever created. He is usually found clinging to rocks or logs along the shores of rivers and lakes and has been known to remain in one position perfectly motionless for many months. How the creature manages to exist is a mystery.

A QUEEN'S GIFT.

Ristori's Request When Told "Anything You Ask Me is Granted."

Mme. Ristori, the celebrated Italian actress of her day, was born of a noble family, but her illustrious career added to the glory of her ancestors.

I frequently went to her receptions, and many were the pleasant chats we had over a cup of tea.

It was on one of these occasions that she told me the interesting story of how when she was once acting in Madrid her success was so colossal that Queen Isabella, who was then on the Spanish throne, sent for her, desiring to speak to her in the royal box. The queen expressed her pleasure in the enthusiasm and then said to Mme. Ristori:

"Anything you ask me is granted."

Without an instant's hesitation Mme. Ristori replied to the queen:

"Madame, if you really wish to give me whatever I ask I will beg you to reprieve the poor man who, as I read this morning, has been sentenced to death and is to be garroted tomorrow."

The queen hesitated a few seconds before she granted this wish. But the reprieve was signed, and the condemned man was, to his great astonishment, released on the eve of his execution, little dreaming that he owed his life to the talented actress. It was typical of Mme. Ristori's noble, generous nature to ask the queen to grant her this request rather than to ask for some jewel or other tangible souvenir to hand down to her descendants.—Frederick Townsend Martin in Ainslee's Magazine.

PUBLIC SPEAKING.

And the Necessity For Cultivating the Art of Enunciation.

Speaking is one of those arts which people seem to think are unnecessary to study and learn, and the probability is that most speakers of the kind mentioned are blissfully unaware of their inaudibility. Doubtless their voice resounds comfortably in the empty spaces of their own chest and head, and this prevents them from knowing that it does not penetrate to the auditory apparatus of other people.

To be a lecturer it is not only necessary to know your subject, but the art of enunciation and audible delivery needs to be learned also. And the sound of one's voice in one's own ears is a most misleading guide. Such people ought to be trained by being made to read or speak from one end of a large room to somebody teaching them at the other end, when they would soon find out that tones which will pass muster in a conversation are useless in a public speech.

In conversation we carelessly slur half our syllables, leaving our interlocutor to guess them from the context, but this will not do in a public speech, where people are too far off to catch the signs. Again, a word pronounced in the ordinary English way—of throwing a strong accent on a single syllable and slurring the other syllables—becomes reduced to a mere monosyllable when said in that manner in a large room.—Theosophical Path.

The People of Great Britain.

Ethnologically Great Britain is a mixture of many races, resulting from a succession of invasions. When the Romans invaded Britain the inhabitants were Celtic, mixed with an earlier Euskarian non-Aryan element. They continued to be mainly so until the fifth and sixth centuries, when the level parts of the country were overrun by German tribes. Then followed invasions by the Danes and other Scandinavian tribes and lastly the Norman conquest. The inhabitants of England and the lowlands of Scotland, therefore, sprang from an amalgamation of the original Celtic with German and Scandinavian blood. Wales and the highlands of Scotland are still inhabited by descendants of the ancient Celtic tribes. The people of Ireland also are of Celtic origin, although there is an admixture of many other races.

Rudimentary Hind Limbs.

Snakes are not the only animals which exhibit the possession of rudimentary hind limbs. In the whale tribe there is no evidence externally of hind limbs. The fore limbs in them are converted into the "flippers," or swimming paddles. Yet when the skeleton is examined traces of a haunch and attached rudimentary thigh bone are found. There is developed in certain kinds of whales a bony piece representing the haunch. The thigh bone is distinct, but there is a mere rudiment attached to it, representing the shin bone or tibia of other animals.

"'Ow's yore little boy gettin' on, Mrs. Black?"

None can injure him who does not injure himself.—St. Chrysostom.

CHANGED HIS MIND.

He Was Awful Strong, but He Took a Dislike to Boxing.

Talking of the padded mitt and its practitioners, some one remembered a story of Tom O'Rourke when he was managing that black warrior, Joe Wolcott. Every now and then some greenhorn would happen along and beg to be tried out. It afforded Mr. O'Rourke and Mr. Wolcott a great deal of innocent pleasure to try them out—plenty. On one occasion a large walnut colored man came, hat in hand, to O'Rourke. "Ah'm most powerful desperit, Mr. O'Rourke," said he, "an' strong! My, my, Ah'm that strong Ah'm jes' natchully afraid to leave mahself go. Ah want you to match me to fight wif somebody."

O'Rourke said that would be easily done if the caller was as good a fighter as he believed himself to be. But he'd have to be tried out first. The stranger said he was willing, and O'Rourke called Wolcott. "Take this man out in the gym," said he, "and try him out."

The pair fiddled and fenced about for awhile. Then Wolcott got his chance, whanged that right hand over, and the stranger bounced three times before he came to rest. By and by he waked up to find O'Rourke bending over him. "Mebbe Ah'd make a pretty good wrestler, Mr. O'Rourke," said he hopefully.—Cincinnati Times-Star.

WALL STREET TIPSTERS.

Wall street is the home of the tipster. You can always find him. You do not need to ask for him. He seeks you out in seductive advertisements, in circulars, letters and all the ways of the shrewd trader. And there are none shrewder than those who nest in Wall street.

You will find the tipsters in every broker's office. Stand at the ticker for a few minutes and hear them as they come up one after another. "This is the time to sell," says one. Directly another appears, takes up the tape, scrutinizes it for a moment, lays it down and exclaims, "A good time to buy!" But go to the head of a house, especially if it be an old, conservative and well established institution, and ask him what he thinks about the market. See how many tips you will get from him. Not many, as a rule.

He will discourse upon the situation, tell you the favorable and unfavorable factors, call attention to certain stocks that may be influenced by current rumors, to others that have new possibilities, to others that may suffer from various reasons, and then he will conclude with a general observation that one man's opinion is as good as another's.—Leslie's.

Making Discoveries.

"Did you know that Frank and Nellie have broken?"

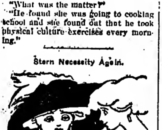
"No; not really?"

"They have."

"What was the matter?"

"He found she was going to cooking school and she found out that he took physical culture exercises every morning."

Stern Necessity Again.



"She's one of our most popular girls."

"But she isn't pretty."

"Not a bit."

"How do you account for her popularity?"

"She's so poor that she has to please every one or she wouldn't get invited out at all."

Competent.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured
by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.
We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

It is lively and easy riding, very durable and lined inside with a special quality of rubber, which never becomes porous and which closes up small punctures without allowing the air to escape. We have hundreds of letters from satisfied customers stating that their tires have only been pumped up once or twice in a whole season. They weigh no more than an ordinary tire, the puncture resisting qualities being given by several layers of thin, specially prepared fabric on the tread. The regular price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but for advertising purposes we are making a special factory price to the rider of only $4.80 per pair. All orders shipped same day letter is received. We ship C. O. D. on approval. You do not pay a cent until you have examined and found them strictly as represented.
Notice the thick rubber tread "A" and puncture strips "B" and "D" also rim strip "H" to prevent rim cutting. This tire will outlast any other make—SOFT, ELASTIC and EASY RIDING.
We will allow a cash discount of 5 per cent (thereby making the price $4.55 per pair) if you send FULL CASH WITH ORDER and enclose this advertisement. You run no risk in sending us an order as the tires may be returned at OUR expense if for any reason they are not satisfactory on examination. We are perfectly reliable and money sent to us is as safe as in a bank. If you order a pair of these tires, you will find that they will ride easier, run faster, wear better, last longer and look finer than any tire you have ever used or seen at any price. We know that you will be so well pleased that when you want a bicycle you will give us your order. We want you to send us a trial order at once, hence this remarkable tire offer.
IF YOU NEED TIRES don't buy any kind at any price until you send for a pair of Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof tires on approval and trial at the special introductory price quoted above; or write for our big Tire and Sundry Catalogue which describes and quotes all makes and kinds of tires at about half the usual prices.
DO NOT WAIT but write us a postal today. DO NOT THINK OF BUYING a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone until you know the new and wonderful offers we are making. It only costs a postal to learn everything. Write it NOW.

SERIAL STORY

EXCUSE ME!

Novelized from the Comedy of the Same Name

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Annie Gattie, a fellow passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers. Mrs. Wellington hears Little Jimmie's voice. Later she meets Mrs. Whitcomb. Mallory reports to Marjorie his failure to find a preacher. They decide to pretend a quarrel and Mallory finds a vacant berth. Mrs. Jimmie discovers Wellington on the train. Mallory again makes an unsuccessful hunt for a preacher. Dr. Temple poses as a physician. Mrs. Temple is induced by Mrs. Wellington to smoke a cigar. Sight of preacher on a station platform raises Mallory's hopes, but he takes another train. Missing hand baggage compels the couple to borrow from passengers. Jimmie gets a cinder in his eye and Mrs. Jimmie gives first aid. Coolness is then resumed. Still no clergyman. More borrowing. Dr. Temple puzzled by behavior of different couples. Marjorie's jealousy aroused by Mallory's baseball jargon. Marjorie suggests wrecking the train in hopes that accident will produce a preacher. Also tries to induce the conductor to hold the train so she can shop. Marjorie's dog is missing. She pulls the cord, stopping the train. Conductor restores dog and lovers quarrel. Lathrop wires for a preacher to marry him and Miss Gattie. Mallory tells Lathrop of his predicament and arranges to borrow the preacher. Kitty Lewellyn, former sweetheart of Mallory's, appears and arouses Marjorie's jealousy. Preacher boards train. After marrying Lathrop and Miss Gattie the preacher escapes Mallory by leaping from moving train.

Mallory caught his hand as it turned the knob of the door and drew him back. Marjorie, equally determined, caught his other elbow:

"Please don't go," Mallory urged, "until you've married us."

"But my dear man, the train's moving."

Marjorie clung all the tighter and invited him to "Come on to the next stop."

"But my dear lady," Selby gasped, "it's impossible."

"You've just got to," Mallory insisted.

"Release me, please."

"Never!"

"How dare you!" the parson shrieked, and with a sudden wriggle writhed out of his coat, leaving it in Marjorie's hands. He darted to the door and flung it open, with Mallory hot after him.

The train was kicking up a cloud of dust and getting its stride. The kidnapped clergyman paused a moment, aghast at the speed with which the ground was being paid out. Then he climbed the brass rail and, with a hasty prayer, dropped overboard.

Mallory lunged at him, and seized him by his reversed collar. But the collar alone remained in his clutch. The parson was almost lost in the dust he created as he struck, bounded and rolled till he came to a stop, with his stars and his prayers to thank for injuries to nothing worse than his dignity and other small clothes.

Mallory returned to the observation room and flung the collar and bib to the floor in a fury of despair, howling:

"He got away! He got away!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

The Empty Berth.

The one thing Mallory was beginning to learn about Marjorie was that she would never take the point of view he expected, and never proceed along the lines of his logic.

She had grown furious at him for what he could not help. She had told him that she would marry him out of spite. She had commanded him to pursue and apprehend the flying parson. He failed and returned crestfallen and wondering what new form her rage would take.

And, lo and behold, when she saw him so downcast and helpless, she rushed to him with caresses, cuddled his broad shoulders against her breast, and smothered him. It was the sincerity of his dejection and the complete helplessness he displayed that won her woman's heart.

Mallory gazed at her with almost more wonderment than delight. This was another flashlight on her character. Most courtships are conducted under a rose-light in which wooer and wooed wear their best clothes on their best behavior; or in a starlit, moonlit, or gaslit twilight where romance softens angles and wraps everything in velvet shadow. Then they get married and begin to live together in the cold, gray daylight of realism, with undignified necessities and harrowing situations at every step, and disillusion begins its deadly work.

This young couple was undergoing all the inconveniences and temper-exposures of marriage without its blessed compensations. They promised to be well acquainted before they were wed. If they still wanted each other after this ordeal, they were pretty well assured that their marriage would not be a failure.

Mallory rejoiced to see that the hurricane of Marjorie's jealousy had only whipped up the surface of her soul. The great depths were still calm and unmoved, and her love for him was in and of the depths.

Soon after leaving Ogden, the train entered upon the great bridge across the Great Salt Lake. The other passengers were staring at the enormous engineering masterpiece and the conductor was pointing out that, in order to save forty miles and the crossing of two mountain chains, the railroad had devoted four years of labor and millions of dollars to stretching a thirty-mile bridge across this inland ocean.

But Marjorie and Mallory never noticed it. They were absorbed in exploring each other's souls, and they had safely bridged the Great Salt Lake which the first big bitter jealousy spreads across every matrimonial route.

They were undisturbed in their voyage, for all the other passengers had their noses flattened against the window panes of the other cars—all except one couple, gazing each at each through time-wrinkled eyelids touched with the magic of a tardy honeymoon.

For all that Anne and Ira knew, the Great Salt Lake was a moon-swept lagoon, and the arid mountains of Nevada which the train went scaling, were the very hillsides of Arcadia.

But the other passengers soon came trooping back into the observation room. Ira had told them nothing of Mallory's confession. In the first place, he was a man who had learned to keep a secret, and in the second place, he had forgotten that such persons as Mallory or his Marjorie existed. All the world was summed up in the fearsomely happy little spinster who had moved up into his section—the section which had begun its career draped in satin ribbons unwittingly prophetic.

The communion of Mallory and Marjorie under the benison of reconciliation was invaded by the jokes of the other passengers, unconsciously ironic.

Dr. Temple chaffed them amiably: "You two will have to take a back seat now. We've got a new bridal couple to amuse us."

The Mallorys were used to the misunderstanding. But the misplaced witticisms gave them reassurance that their secret was safe yet a little while. At their dinner-table, however, and in the long evening that followed they were haunted by the fact that this was their last night on the train, and no minister to be expected.

And now once more the Mallorys regained the star roles in the esteem of the audience, for once more they quarreled at good-night-kissing time. Once more they required two sections, while Anne Gattie's berth was not even made up. It remained empty, like a deserted nest, for its occupant had flown south.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Fresh Trouble Daily.

The following morning the daylight creeping into section number one found Ira and Anne staring at each other. Ira was tousled and Anne was unkempt, but her blush still gave her cheek at least an Indian summer glow.

After a violent effort to reach the space between her shoulder blades, she was compelled to appeal to her new master to act as her new maid.

"Oh, Mr. Lathrop," she stammered—"Ira," she corrected, "won't you please hook me up?" she pleaded.

Ira beamed with a second childhood boyishness: "I'll do my best, my little ootsum-tootsums, it's the first time I ever tried it."

"Oh, I'm so glad," Anne sighed, "it's the first time I ever was hooked up by a gentleman."

He gurgled with joy and, forgetting the poverty of space, tried to reach her lips to kiss her. He almost broke her neck and bumped his head so hard that instead of saying, as he intended, "My darling," he said, "Oh, hell!"

"Ira!" she gasped. But he, with all the proprietorship he had assumed, answered cheerily: "You'll have to get used to it, ducky darling. I could never learn not to swear." He proved the fact again and again by the remarks he addressed to certain refractory hooks. He apologized, but she felt more like apologizing for herself.

"Oh, Ira," she said, "I'm so ashamed to have you see me like this—the first morning."

"Well, you haven't got anything on me—I'm not shaved."

"You don't have to tell me that," she said, rubbing her smarting cheek. Then she bumped her head and gasped: "Oh—what you said."

This made them feel so much at home that she attained the heights of frankness and honesty by reaching in her handbag for a knob of supplementary hair, which she affixed dexterously to what was home-grown. Ira, instead of looking shocked, loved her for her honesty, and grinned:

"Now, that's where you have got something on me. Say, we're like a couple of sardines trying to make love in a tin can."

"It's cosy though," she said, and then vanished through the curtains and shyly ran the gauntlet of amused glances and over-cordial "Good mornings" till she hid her blushes behind the door of the women's room and turned the key. If she had thought of it she would have said, "God bless the man that invented doors—and the other angel that invented locks."

The passengers this morning were all a little brisker than usual. It was the last day aboard for everybody and they showed a certain extra animation, like the inmates of an ocean liner when land has been sighted.

Ashton was shaving when Ira swaggered into the men's room. Without pausing to note whom he was addressing, Ashton sang out:

"Good morning. Did you rest well?"

"What?" Ira roared.

"Oh, excuse me!" said Ashton, hastily, devoting himself to a gash his razor had made in his cheek—even in that cheek of his.

Ira scrubbed out the basin, filled it and tried to dive into it, slapping the cold water in double handfuls over his glowing face and puffing through it like a porpoise.

Meanwhile the heavy-eyed Fosdick was slinking through the dining-car, regarded with amazement by Dr. Temple and his wife, who were already up and breakfasting.

"What's the matter with the bridal couples on this train, anyway?" said Dr. Temple.

"Some more coffee, please, mother," he said.

"But your nerves," she protested.

"It's my vacation," he insisted.

Mrs. Temple stared at him and shook her head: "I wonder what mischief you'll be up to today? You've already been smoking, gambling, drinking—have you been swearing, yet?"

"Not yet," the old clergyman smiled, "I've been saving that up for a good occasion. Perhaps it will rise before the day's over."

And his wife choked on her tea at the wonderful train-change that had come over the best man in Ypsilanti.

By this time Fosdick had reached the stateroom from which he had been banished again at the Nevada state-line. He knocked cautiously. From within came an anxious voice: "Who's there?"

"Whom did you expect?"

Mrs. Fosdick popped her head out like a Jill in the box. "Oh, it's you, Arthur. Kiss me good morning."

He glanced round stealthily and obeyed instructions: "I guess it's safe—my darling."

"Did you sleep, dovie?" she yawned.

"Not a wink. They took off the Portland car at Granger and I had to sleep in one of the chairs in the observation room."

Mrs. Fosdick shook her head at him in mournful sympathy, and asked: "What state are we in now?"

"A dreadful state—Nevada."

"Just what are we in Nevada?"

"I'm a bigamist, and you've never been married at all."

"Oh, these awful divorce laws!" she moaned, then left the general for the particular: "Won't you come in and hook me up?"

Fosdick looked shocked; "I don't dare compromise you."

"Will you take breakfast with me—in the dining-car?" she pleaded.

"Do we dare?"

"We might call it luncheon," she suggested.

He seized the chance: "All right, I'll go ahead and order, and you stroll in and I'll offer you the seat opposite me."

"But can't you hook me up?"

He was adamant: "Not till we get to California. Do you think I want to compromise my own wife? Shh! Somebody's coming!" And he darted off to the vestibule just as Mrs. Jimmie Wellington issued from number ten with hair askew, eyes only half open, and waist only half shut at the back. She made a quick spurt to the women's room, found it locked, stamped her foot, swore under her breath, and leaned against the wall of the car to wait.

What Figureheads Mean.

When the wall of a city was built or the foundation of a public building was laid in ancient times men used to supply the edifice with a guardian spirit by burying within it a human being. The ghost of the victim was supposed to take possession of the structure and bless it with good fortune.

And when a boat or ship was launched it was made to roll over the body of a man for the same purpose. Substitution of the bodies and blood of animals followed, and civilized peoples have softened the ceremony until only symbolic wine remains.

The figureheads upon ships are remnants of the custom of binding the body of the immolated god upon the prow at launching, and they are still regarded as mascots.

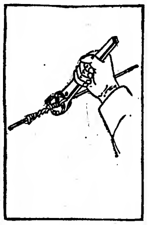
Bull Objected to Rider.

A millionaire rancher, of Pomona, Cal., was painfully injured, recently, while attempting to ride a large red Durham bull. He had made a wager with another rancher that he could remain on the bull's back for two minutes, faith in his ability to win the wager being based upon his experiences in broncho riding. He lost the bet by just 117 seconds, for three seconds after he mounted the animal's back, he was seated in the center of the corral nursing a badly wrenched hip and shoulder.

TO MAKE GOOD WIRE JOINTS

Ohio Man Invents Ingenious Implement That Does the Work in Most Workmanlike Fashion.

An ingenious implement for making wire joints has been patented by an Ohio man. With its aid two pieces of wire can be joined so firmly that the joint is as strong as a single wire and is made in a most workmanlike fashion. The tool is in two parts, each with a hub section and a handle. The hub sections have laterally projecting teeth and slots, through which the free ends of the wires enter. A piece of wire is put into each of the slots and the two sections placed together.



To Make Wire Joints.

As the tool is worked backward and forward the wires are wound around each other and the curling teeth coil them up neatly along their lengths until both ends are wrapped and a neat, strong joint is formed. It requires only a few minutes to accomplish this.

Table of Weights and Measures Provident Housekeeper Insists Upon in Buying Produce.

The following table of weights and measures may prove of value to provident housekeepers who look after their own marketing and seek to get the worth of their money:

One peck of spinach weighs three pounds.

One peck of carrots, turnips, parsnips or sweet potatoes weighs thirteen and three-fourths pounds.

One peck of potatoes or beets weighs fifteen pounds.

One quart of dried peas weighs one and seven-eighths pounds.

SAVE ALL THE ALFALFA SEED

Side Delivery "Rower" or "Buncher" Has Been Perfected That Any Blacksmith Can Make.

The heaviest loss in cutting a seed crop of alfalfa with an ordinary mower comes from shattering by the wheels and tramping of the horses over the last cut swath. To avoid this loss a side delivery "rower" or "buncher" has been perfected and is now on the market. One may easily be made by any blacksmith at comparatively small cost, says the Farmers' Mail and Breeze. Twelve or fifteen iron rods of proper length, bent as shown and fastened to the back of the sickle bar, is all there is to it. The bunching device on the inner end may or may not be used. Where this attachment is used it has been found a good plan to bunch the swaths into small shocks with a fork, making them just large enough to be lifted into the wagon as one forkful. This does away with the shattering that comes from tearing larger cocks to pieces when loading.

"Buncher" Attached to Sickle Bar.

Value of Silos.

The small silo is more expensive in proportion to its capacity. A silo should be not less than 10 feet in diameter. The height should be at least twice as great as the diameter. On the average farm two medium sized silos are more satisfactory than one extremely large one.

Neat Farm Home.

The Stomach Is the Target

Aim to make that strong—and digestion good—and you will keep well! No chain is stronger than its weakest link. No man is stronger than his stomach. With stomach disordered a train of diseases follow.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

makes the stomach healthy, the liver active and the blood pure. Made from forest roots, and extracted without the use of alcohol. Sold by druggists, in liquid form at $1.00 per bottle for over 40 years, giving general satisfaction.

Scotch Query.

A bluff, consequential gentleman from the south, with more beef on his bones than brain in his head, riding along the Hamilton road, near to Blantyre, asked a herdboy on the roadside, in a tone and manner evidently meant to quiz, if he were "halfway to Hamilton?" Paid Minister in Tinfoil.

The meanest man in the world has been found. He is the man who gave the Rev. Thilo Gore, pastor of the German Lutheran church, an envelope filled with tinfoil for marrying him.

The bride and groom rang Dr. Gore's doorbell late one night and asked him to marry them. As they had a license, he did so. After the ceremony was performed the man handed the minister an envelope which was supposed to contain the fee. He found it contained nothing but several pieces of tinfoil.—Chicago Tribune.

Probably Prize Grouch.

A grouchy butcher, who had watched the price of porterhouse steak climb the ladder of fame, was deep in the throes of an unusually bad grouch when a would-be customer, 8 years old, approached him and handed him a penny.

"Please, mister, I want a cent's worth of sausage."

An Underworld.

"You say you saw New York's underworld?" said the horrified relative.

"Oh, yes," replied Mrs. McGudley. "And I consider it very neat and interesting. I think every large city ought to have a subway system."

Really a Small Matter.

"Have you anything against Timpers?"

"Nothing more than the fact that he make 'film 'a word of two syllables.' '

NO MEDICINE

But Change of Food Gave Final Relief.

A great deal of our stomach and bowel troubles come from eating too much starchy and greasy food.

The stomach does not digest any of the starchy food we eat—white bread, pastry, potatoes, oats, etc.—these things are digested in the small intestines, and if we eat too much, as most of us do, the organs that should digest this kind of food are overcome by excess of work, so that fermentation, indigestion, and a long train of ails result.

Too much fat also is hard to digest and this is changed into acids, sour stomach, belching gas, and a bloated, heavy feeling.

In these conditions a change from indigestible foods to Grape-Nuts will work wonders in not only relieving the distress but in building up a strong digestion, clear brain and steady nerves. A Wash. woman writes:

"About five years ago I suffered with bad stomach—dyspepsia, indigestion, constipation—caused, I know now, from overeating starchy and greasy food.

"I doctored for two years without any benefit. The doctor told me there was no cure for me. I could not eat anything without suffering severe pain in my back and sides, and I became discouraged.

"A friend recommended Grape-Nuts and I began to use it. In less than two weeks I began to feel better and inside of two months I was a well woman and have been ever since.

"I can eat anything I wish with pleasure. We eat Grape-Nuts and cream for breakfast and are very fond of it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Hard to See Under Water.

"There is no scientific instrument of the "scope" character which enables one to see down to 50 or 60 feet under water. But without electric or some other light in the water these devices are not very satisfactory.

THE RIGHT SOAP FOR BABY'S SKIN

In the care of baby's skin and hair, Cuticura Soap is the mother's favorite. St. Paul.—Colonel Roosevelt has carried Minnesota by at least 15,000. This represents the returns from 2,333 precincts and those still to be heard from are not expected to change the result.

The count now stands: Taft, 53,722; Wilson, 96,867, and Roosevelt, 113,008. In the returns received no tabulation has been made of the vote given the Socialist and the Prohibition candidates for the president.

Governor Eberhart will have about 32,000 votes to the good when the full returns are received. He climbed steadily and now has 115,601 votes. This represents 2,373 precincts of a total of about 3,000. P. M. Ringdal, the Democratic candidate, followed with 89,756 and P. V. Collins, a Bull Moose candidate, with 27,537. Mr. Ringdal made some surprising gains in the northern part of the state, but the increase was offset by gains made by the governor in the southern section.

Surprise in Lobeck Vote.

The surprising feature of the returns to date is the vote cast for E. V. Lobeck, the Prohibition candidate for governor. He carried his home county, Douglas, and made heavy gains in other counties. Kandiyohi county was particularly good for the Prohibition candidate. In this county he received 737 votes to 1,191 for Eberhart. Here Ringdal was a poor third. Lobeck made heavy gains in Faribault, Anoka and Lac qui Parle counties.

When the tabulation of votes is completed it is expected that the Prohibitionists will have third place. Public Ownership fourth and the Bull Moose a poor fifth. The third party candidate has made little showing. It is estimated that his vote will be under 30,000. Mr. Sharkey, candidate for railroad and warehouse commissioner, made the best showing, so far as the Bull Moose party is concerned.

This is the first time in the history of the state that the Prohibition party has polled a vote exceeding 20,000. In 1888 it got a trifle over 17,000 and in the year following the total vote cast for that party ranged from 8,000 to 12,000.

Brown's Majority About 20,000.

Judge C. L. Brown has been elected chief justice beyond a question. His majority will be about 20,000. Some 2,022 precincts out of the total 3,000, gave Judge Brown 76,784, Stanton, 60,983 and Stewart, 45,669.

In the case of the justice of the supreme court, Judge Hallam has a slight lead over Judge Bunn, a member of the court. The Hallam vote at midnight was 80,097, and Bunn, 78,426. Judge Holt of Minneapolis was credited with a vote of 86,178. These returns were on a basis of 2,022 precincts.

In the preliminaries it was expected that Justice Holt would suffer by reason of his Twin City residence, as Judge Hallam and Bunn, but in the returns to date, the Minneapolis man has gained steadily and continues to maintain his lead.

Senator Nelson Indorsed.

Senator Nelson is overwhelmingly indorsed. His majority will be fully 65,000. The 1,495 precincts in the state received so far give the senior senator 102,165 and D. W. Lawler, his Democratic opponent, 66,114.

JAMES MANAHAN.

James Manahan, for congressman-at-large, is also a big winner. His majority will be in the 60,000 class and may be even greater. He now has 81,307 votes to his credit, with 40,677 for Buell, his Democratic opponent.

J. A. A. Burnquist, the Republican candidate for lieutenant governor, is nearly 40,000 ahead of Wilson Powers his Democratic rival. This was on the basis of returns from 1,199 precincts.

Judge Ira B. Mills of the railroad and warehouse commission may have the honor of leading the Republican ticket in the vote cast, though he is hard pressed by Secretary of State Schmahl. The third party candidates handicapped them but little.

GOV. A. O. EBERHART.

Both Judge Mills and C. E. Elmquist, the present Republican members of the railroad and warehouse commission, are safe. Returns from 1,255 precincts give Mills 87,874, Reiter, Democrat, 51,038.

Elmquist had to divide with two candidates, one of them being a Progressive. His vote to date is 77,047 Gayner, Democrat, 44,064; and Sharkey, Progressive, 19,025.

In Congressional Districts.

In the First, Sidney Anderson is an easy winner over his Democratic opponent, Clinton Robinson. In the Second W. S. Hammond, Democrat, wins by a handsome majority over F. F. Ellsworth, author of the resolution which made a third party ticket in Minnesota possible. In the Third, C. R. Davis wins by about 5,000 majority over his Democratic opponent, F. L Glotzbach.

The Victory of F. C. Stevens.

The victory of F. C. Stevens in the Fourth district was one of the unexpected results. Mr. Stevens was facing a bitter fight and the Democrats had named a strong man. The complete defeat of Hugh T. Halbert is the Ramsey county answer to the third party ticket, placed in the field after the primary nominations were made.

SEN. KNUTE NELSON.

In Hennepin county, the victory of George R. Smith was expected but its completeness was more than had been anticipated in view of the three cornered fight made against him.

In the Sixth district, C. A. Lindberg is an easy winner over his Democratic opponent. Dr. Gilkison and A. J. Volstead was elected without opposition in the Seventh.

Clarence B. Miller, Republican was an easy winner over John Jenswold in the Eighth, or Duluth district, while Halvor Steenerson wins by a reduced majority in the Ninth.

The strength which President Taft developed shows conclusively what might have been done for the president had the national committee commenced its fight earlier.

The revival of Taft sentiment came late, but it was marked all along the line. Republicans voted freely for Woodrow Wilson and in Minnesota, as in other states, turned the tide to the Democratic candidate through lack of confidence in the chance of their own candidate to win.

London Dinners Are Shorter.

London.—Even the London city dinners are feeling the influence of the change which has come over dining habits in the last few years. Inquiries at a well-known city restaurant, famous for its feasts, have shown that the art of dining has been on an ever-increasing tendency toward shorter dinners. Quicker service and smaller menus is the demand. Good dinners are still expensive, but less expansive. The dinner of today is an interlude in the program and not the program itself.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyser

NUMBER NINETY-FOUR

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

(Editor's Note.—I made M. Goron's acquaintance some years ago, and was at once struck with his extraordinary powers of observation, his keen-wittedness, and his devouring energy in the discharge of his difficult duties. For it must be remembered that the Chief of the Paris Detective Police wields enormous power and is allowed a certain discretion—except, of course, when a crime has been committed—to save innocent persons the disgrace of a public scandal.

A few months ago I was smoking a pipe in his study, a room hung with trophies—a museum of crime. I saw him take up a thick, leather-bound volume, the pages covered with writing, with here and there portraits and curious-looking drawings. "This is my diary," he began, but suddenly stopped when he saw me start.

"Yes, it is my diary," he repeated; "but—what's the trouble?"

"Your diary? And you never thought of publishing it?"

"No," he retorted with a smile; "the fact is, here are all my impressions, and certain facts——"

I did not even know the end of the sentence; I took up the book and began reading at once; and the more I read the more I marveled. The next morning we commenced work, and this series is the result.—A. K.)

THE BELGIAN Government had demanded the extradition of the swindler Karstens, and, for purposes of identification, I had asked the people who had dealings with him to come to my office.

Among those who called upon me was Charles Vernet, a financier, and, while I listened to the evidence he gave in a clear, concise manner, the conviction stole upon me that I had met him before under different circumstances. But where?—when? Although I have an excellent memory for faces, his features were not familiar to me; yet his general appearance, the way he raised his right hand when he spoke, roused old recollections.

"Who is he?" I inquired the next day of the police commissary in M. Charles Vernet's district.

"Who is he?" repeated my friend, with a touch of surprise in his voice. "My dear Goron, don't you really know Charles Vernet?"

"Well, yes, of course I understand he is a financier, with plenty of money; but I know nothing about him."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Look here, Goron, I never know when you are making fun of anybody; but if you put the question to me seriously, let me tell you that Charles Vernet is not only rich, but bears a good reputation on the Bourse, and is received everywhere."

"How long has he been in Paris?"

"About ten years. He came here with a large fortune made at the Cape, and has doubled it since."

"Who is he?" I again asked myself when I went to bed.

For days and days the man's face seemed to follow me. I mentally passed in review the various persons I had met in the course of my career, without being able to locate him. Yet I felt certain I had seen him when his name was not Charles Vernet.

I took out my journal, looking over the cases with which I had been connected since I became chief of the detective police. And still no trace of him.

I worked my way back to the days when I was assistant to M. Clement, at the Prefecture, and police commissary in the Pantin Quarter, until I came upon the murder of Moulin, the notary's clerk, by a fellow called Simon. And then I paused; for it suddenly dawned upon me that Simon was the man I must have had in my mind when I saw Charles Vernet.

Moulin lived in the Rue des Abbesses, and he and Simon were friends. One night a lodger, occupying a room below Moulin's, was awakened by the noise of a scuffle overhead, and, going to the rescue, met a man hurrying past him. Moulin was lying on his bed stabbed to the heart. When Simon, was arrested the next day, the lodger recognized him as the man he had seen on the stairs. Simon, who had already been implicated in several unpleasant affairs, never admitted his guilt; and, in the absence of direct proofs, the jury brought in a verdict by which he escaped the guillotine, but was sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude.

I inquired at the Prefecture, where I learned that Simon and a man called Aymard had planned to escape from Cayenne. Aymard had succeeded in getting away, while Simon, his face battered in and his body covered with wounds, was found in a ditch. His identity had been disclosed by his jacket, which bore the number "94."

The report of Simon's death did not remove my doubts. But, as in the face of the official statement I could not well apply to the authorities for assistance, I determined to try to solve the problem myself.

If my theory was right—that Charle Vernet and Simon were the same person—it must have been Simon who placed the telltale jacket with the number 94 on the body of Aymard, whom, no doubt, he had murdered to insure his own safety. This trick had been performed several times and, from my recollection of Simon, he was not the man to shrink from killing his companion.

I took all the papers relating to the Simon case with me, and gathered from them an interesting fact. While under remand, Simon—probably to curry favor with the authorities—had denounced a youth named Berger, as having been concerned in a burglary in the Rue des Saints-Peres, in connection with which three men had been sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. Berger was arrested, but, as it was proved that he had thus far borne an excellent character, and had been fooled by his companions, he got off very lightly.

I had reason to suppose that Berger, knowing it was Simon who had betrayed him, would not be sorry to get even with his enemy, and I therefore decided to have a talk with him, without, of course, letting him know more than was strictly necessary. In fact, I had to be very careful how I went to work.

So far, everything was only supposition. The official report about Simon's death might have been true, and my theory about the likeness between the two men—the financier and the convict—altogether wrong. In that case a mistake would have proved disastrous.

Twelve years had elapsed since the trial of Simon, and it was possible that Berger had disappeared. Fortunately I had a clue. Berger at the time of his arrest, was courting a woman who kept a tobacco-shop in the Latin Quarter, the widow of a man called Samson, for which reason the students had christened her "Delilah."

When I called at the little shop in the Rue Saint-Andre-des-Arts, I found it had changed hands, and in the place of the buxom Madame Delilah was a thin, good-natured looking little woman, fond of gossip. I bought some cigarettes, and she was soon giving me the biography of every member of her family. Then I deflected our talk to Madame Delilah, whereupon the lady-tobacconist looked severe.

"Did you know that person?" she asked.

"No, no," I hurriedly replied, "I have only seen her once or twice, when she was engaged to a man—a man—I can't remember his name."

The lady-tobacconist continued to look severe and, with scorn in her voice, remarked:

"Engaged, engaged—who do you think would have engaged himself to Delilah?"

"I fancy I heard she was going to marry somebody called Burger or Berger."

"Berger, you mean. That jailbird?"

"Yes. What has become of him?"

"When he was discharged from prison he took up photography, and migrated to Belleville; but that's several years ago."

In Belleville, the populous quarter, there are several establishments where the Paris workmen celebrate their weddings, and, according to custom, have themselves photographed on the important day. The restaurant of the Las Saint-Fargeau, at the top of the steep Rue de Belleville, is the most famous place for this kind of entertainments, and I decided to go there first. When I reached the establishment, at two in the afternoon, several wedding-parties had taken possion of the garden, and a photographer was busy with his apparatus, while his assistant arranged the groups.

"What is the name of the artist?" I inquired of the proprietor.

"Masson," he replied.

At that moment the assistant passed us to fetch a chair from the house. I stopped him, and asked whether he knew a photographer named Berger.

He eyed me curiously.

"My name is Berger."

I had reason to congratulate myself on my luck. And, looking at the man, I detected a likeness to his portrait I had seen at the Prefecture.

I waited till the rush of work was over, and then beckoned to him. When I told him who I was, he frowned.

"M. Goron," he exclaimed, "I hoped this horrible affair was forgotten. I am earning my living honestly. Why am I again to be troubled?"

"You have nothing to fear, my good fellow. Your affair, as you call it, is dead and buried. All I ask you is to call on me, to-morrow morning at half-past ten. I have a question to put to you."

"All right, sir," he sighed.

On my return to the office I sent a note to Charles Vernet, with the request to come to me the next morning at eleven, as I wanted some more information from him regarding the Belgian swindler.

At half-past ten, punctually, Berger was announced.

"Berger," I began, "you need not look so miserable. I give you my word nobody will hurt you."

He smiled faintly.

A few minutes past eleven Vernet was introduced. I apologized for troubling him again, and handed him a few documents relative to the Karstens affair. While he was reading them I went to Berger.

The small room where I had left him, and to which nobody had access, opened into my office. In the door was a little hole.

"You see that hole?" I asked.

"Yes, sir."

"Put your eye to it, and look carefully at the gentleman inside. When he is gone I shall call you."

My conversation with Charles Vernet did not last many minutes; and the moment he had left I went to Berger.

He stared at me like one in a dream.

"Well, Berger?"

He remained silent for a while, and then shook his head.

"Who is he?" he said at last.

"That is the very question I wanted to put to you."

He sat, deep in thought, one hand playing with his hat, turning it mechanically around.

"Who is he, and why did you show him to me?" he asked again.

"M. Goron," he cried excitedly, "you have awakened in me a feeling I had managed to smother. You know my history. You know how I was dragged into the affair, and you know the name of the villain who brought the trouble on my head. When I was discharged from Gaillon I had but one idea—to be avenged on Simon. And when I heard his body had been found in Cayenne, I thought he still might have escaped—he is so artful. Then I looked at every man in the streets, and I fancied I saw Simon. At last it became such an obsession that I felt I was growing mad under the strain, and I fought hard against it, until Simon's face ceased to haunt me. And, now, to-day, this feeling has returned in all its intensity. Why?"

"Yes—why?"

"It is the sight of the man that did it. He is not Simon. He looks quite different. Yet, something in his manner, in the way he holds himself, reminds me of him. Who is he?"

"That is none of your business. Now, go home and think no more about it. I will give you an introduction to one of my friends who can put a lot of work in your way."

Berger's face brightened.

"Thank you, M. Goron; you don't know the struggle I am having."

"You will get on better now. Here is my card. And—not a word about this interview."

Berger had strengthened my suspicions, and the moment had arrived for the decisive trial. I had a difficult part to play, but I felt equal to it.

Charles Vernet entertained frequently in his tastefully furnished apartment in the Rue de la Faisanderie. He also went much into society, and was a constant guest at the house of Madame S——, the well-known sculptor, at whose receptions the elite of the artistic and literary world congregated.

Madame S——, a charming hostess, and one of the most fascinating of women, had often invited me to these gatherings, but I never found the time to attend them. Now, however, I made up my mind to go to the soiree she was giving at the end of the mouth, and I called on my friend, Camille L——, who, I knew, helped her with them.

"Camille," I said, "I want you to ask me to luncheon with Madame S——, and also to secure me an invitation to her reception on the 28th."

"Nothing easier," said Camille.

Two days later I received an invitation to lunch with him and Madame S——, at Durand's. When coffee was served, Camille turned the conversation to the soiree.

"I suppose," he said, "you will, as usual, have an 'All Paris' assembly, including the financial swells?"

"Why don't you invite our friend here?" asked Camille.

"What is the good?" pouted the lady. "He never comes."

"Try him again."

"Very well. M. Goron, will you give me the pleasure of your company?"

"It will be an honor to me, madame."

Madame S—— clapped her hands with joy.

"I am much obliged to you, M. Goron. And I want you to contribute your share to the night's entertainment. Cannot you tell us something interesting?"

"A lecture?"

"Why not? That would be splendid."

"I doubt whether it would amuse your guests; but possibly I may find something else to suit their jaded palates. And, if it is not indiscreet on my part, will you allow me to bring my young nephew? He is here on a visit."

"By all means; I shall be delighted."

The eventful evening arrived, and I drove up to Madame S——'s with a parcel carefully wrapped in brown paper, which I left down-stairs in charge of one of the servants. As to my nephew, nobody would have guessed that the good-looking, well-dressed young man, with the gardenia in his buttonhole, was a smart detective in whom I placed absolute reliance.

When I entered the salons the guests had nearly all arrived. I recognized Pailleron, Lucien March of the Illustration, Alphonse Daudet, Meissonier, Puvis de Chavannes, Lamoureux, Francisque Sarcey, Benjamin Constant, Sardou, actors and actresses from the leading theaters, famous scientists—a brilliant crowd.

There was some excellent music, and then a long-haired gentleman unfolded the mysteries of the cinematograph—at that time quite a novelty. A professor from the Sorbonne showed us a new electrometer; and a Societaire from the Comedie-Francaise gave some recitations.

I was sitting in a quiet corner, watching Charles Vernet deep in conversation with three or four Stock Exchange men, when Madame came toward me, both hands extended.

"Dear M. Goron," she cried, "it is now your turn."

And, taking my arm, she led me to the center of the room. My friend Camille asked for silence for the hostess, who said:

"M. Goron, whom we are all glad to welcome here, has promised to give us some of his experiences. It is a surprise I kept in store for you."

Loud applause followed. A small table with the traditional glass of water was brought for me; the ladies sat in a semicircle, the gentlemen formed the background.

"Ladies and gentlemen," I began, when silence was restored, "our charming hostess has told you I would relate some of my experiences. I have no such intention, for the simple reason that you all know more about them than I do myself. Newspaper reporting has become one of the fine arts, and no sooner is a crime committed than the papers bring the fullest details. Nay, the up-to-date journalist seems even to have the gift of prophecy; for many a time I read of burglaries and attempted murders that have not yet occurred. I therefore, thought that instead of giving you narratives offering but little interest, I would draw your attention to the curious evolution which the detective's profession, like everything nowadays, has undergone.

"Years ago, the man whose duty it is to fight the enemies of society had his own powers to rely upon. Between him and the criminal it was skill against skill, art against art. Then came the modern inventions—railways, steamers, the telegraph, the telephone—and matters grew worse for the detective. Alas! it was the murderers, the forgers, who had the advantage, inasmuch as they could steal a long march upon Nemesis, and get their accomplices to use the telegraph and the telephone for their benefit.

"The question, therefore, was to discover a system by which society, and not its foes, would reap the advantage. Ladies and gentlemen, this system has been found, and the man to whom we owe it, and whose name will go down to posterity, is M. Bertillon."

I undid the parcel which my "nephew," at my request, had brought upstairs.

"This box," I continued, "contains the instruments used in the anthropometrical department for the identification of those who, having previously fallen into the hands of the police, expect to escape detection by changing their names, or altering, as they think, their appearance."

Having explained to the company the practical working of the system, and how the little instruments are applied to the head and fingers, I said:

"With your kind permission, I will now conclude with a practical demonstration, which will leave to some of you a little souvenir of my lecture. As I had already the honor to explain, the measurements of the incriminated person are put down on a card, to which his photograph is affixed, and thus we possess the infallible means of discovering, at a moment's notice, the identity of the person arrested. It is a net through whose meshes nothing can slip. I have brought some of these cards with me, and shall be happy to take the measurement of any lady or gentlemen, and present them with the card."

I never saw such excitement. Dozens of charming women made a rush for me, and sweet voices cried, "Measure me, please, M. Goron."

"One moment, ladies," I called out, "the mistress of the house first."

Madame S—— came promptly forward, and, after I had attended to her and a number of ladies, my "nephew" filling up the cards, I raised my hand.

"And now the gentlemen!"

Sarcey was the first to present himself. Then came Daudet, and other distinguished personages.

All along I had kept my eye on Charles Vernet, who had remained in the background, and now slowly moved toward the door.

"M. Vernet," I said, "don't go away. Have your measurements taken."

He hesitated a moment, and then said, with what appeared to me a forced smile:

"No, thank you, I have seen the thing done before."

"Well, I have set my mind upon measuring you. Ladies," I cried, to a couple of American girls, who had been among the first to be operated upon, "please take him into custody and bring him to me."

Amid shouts of laughter they seized him and pulled him toward the table.

This time he scowled.

"Of course. It is part of the fun."

Either my suspicions were unfounded, or the man had mavelous self-possion. He never moved a muscle while being measured.

Others were now pressing forward, but, on the pretext that I had no more cards, I withdrew to the smoking-room, whither Vernet had gone, followed by my detective. The latter had given Vernet a prepared card, and had quickly slipped into my hand the one he had just filled up; whereupon I went into a corner to compare it with the official document relative to Simon, which I had borrowed from M. Bertillon's office.

A glance was sufficient. The figures were identical. It was not Vernet, but Simon, the escaped convict, the murder, who stood there, lighting his cigar, making an appointment with a friend to meet him the next day. The next day! And in five minutes the thunderbolt would have fallen on his head.

I went up to him.

"Have you said good-night to the lady of the house?" I asked.

He turned sharply around.

"Monsieur Goron—" he began.

"Hush! Don't make a scene. Say good-by to the hostess, and tell her you will have to leave Paris to-morrow on a long journey. You will be telling the truth. Go."

He did not move.

"For the second and last time," I whispered, "I advise you not to make a scene. It is not to Charles Vernet I am speaking, it is to Simon, the assassin of Aymard. My 'nephew' over yonder is a detective, and I have three more 'nephews' down-stairs in case of emergency."

He thought a moment. And then—

"I will go with you; but you are making a mistake you will regret."

It was the never-varying reply of the criminal at bay. Yet I could not help admiring the man's nerve. He shook hands with Madame S—— and a few more people in a seemingly unconcerned manner, and walked downstairs.

In the hall, where a servant handed him his overcoat, my attendant, at a signal from me, cleverly searched Vernet's pockets, and withdrew something which he handed me. It was a small revolver.

"You were right, sir," he said; "I should not have thought of that."

At the Prefecture they were astounded. My prisoner made a plucky stand, and fought desperately against the overwhelming odds; but, finally, like all the other criminals I have seen, he broke down before the pitiless Bertillon system.

Yes, he was Simon; but as, according to law, he had to be tried in Cayenne for having escaped, and on suspicion of having murdered Aymard, he was at once conveyed to the Ile de Re to be sent out to the penal settlement.

But, despite my warning, the officials at the Ile de Re prison did not keep a careful watch on Simon, for the day before he was to have been put on board the steamer, he managed to strangle himself.

Caught at Last.

To bring about the victory of good over evil has been assumed to be the especial aim of saints and sages; but savages, it seems, may sometimes be militant in the same cause. In his recent book, "The White Waterfall," Mr. James Francis Dwyer relates the story of a missionary who preached to a tribe of blacks in northern Queensland, and told them in simple language of Adam and Eve and their expulsion from the Garden of Eden.

The episode of the serpent much excited the converts, and when the missionary arrived at the blacks' camp on the following day, the natives had collected half a hundred or more snakes, which they brought out for the good man's inspection.

"But why do you want me to examine them?" asked the parson, puzzled.

The chief of the tribe winked knowingly.

"You tell 'em if old snake here that mak 'em plenty trouble, Mr. Adam," he said, grinning. "We think 'em you find dat old feller with this lot."—Youth's Companion.

Woman on the Firing Line.

In one of the recent encounters around Homs, says a Tripoli dispatch, the Italian troops captured in the Turkish lines a European woman who was standing by her wounded horse. She was armed with a rifle and about one hundred cartridges, and when captured refused to give any particulars as to her identity. The woman is being kept a prisoner of war.

Mahogany as Fuel.

Rosewood and mahogany are so plentiful in Mexico that some of the copper mines there are timbered with rosewood, while mahogany is used as fuel for the engines.

Can You Guess?

Mrs. Bacon—Did they have any long speeches at the meeting?

Mr. Bacon—Well, two ladies spoke.

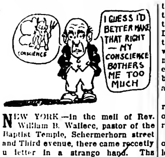
Returns to Church Money He Stole When a Boy



CONSCIENCE
I GUESS I'D BETTER MAKE THAT RIGHT — MY CONSCIENCE BOTHERS ME TOO MUCH

NEW YORK.—In the mail of Rev. William B. Wallace, pastor of the Baptist Temple, Schermerhorn street and Third avenue, there came recently a letter in a strange hand. The writer had a story to tell which interested the pastor greatly. Years and years before he had stolen some money from the Sunday school fund of the church at the time it was on Nassau street. Now he wanted to restore it.

Nearly forty years had elapsed since the writer, then a 15-year-old boy, had pilfered a small sum of money from the funds of the church. Most of those who attended the church at that time have long been in their graves. Dr. Wallace has been in charge only two or three years and the incident was new to him. At the regular monthly meeting of the board of deacons, he asked the members of the board if they remembered anything about it, but none did.

Dr. Wallace wrote his unknown correspondent the other day the matter of restitution was something which rested with his own conscience.

"In the days when the church was on Nassau street," explained Dr. Wallace the other day, "a boy took a small sum of money from the Sunday school funds. That was in 1873.

"I know nothing about the theft or how much it was. The man had no fortune. He is a person of moderate means, as I understand it, and simply wanted to make restitution of the amount missing. The man has been converted within the last two or three years."

Merchant Who Manages Well Without Eyesight.

HERE'S ME CHANCT TER CIT RID OF DIS — PLUGGED QUARTER

PHILADELPHIA.—Here's another wonder of the world—a blind man at Sixth and Chestnut streets who captures thieves, detects counterfeit coins and breaks up the gangs that manufacture and traffic in bogus money. Besides doing this, famous "Blind Al," who has been in the neighborhood for many years, sells newspapers, candy and fruit; goes to market in crowded Dock street all alone—and never has he knocked a basket over.

"Oh, yes," said he, "some people try to cheat me yet, but I usually catch them; I've caught 221 of them in the 33 years I've been blind. If they cheat me once they usually come and try it again, but I soon discover something wrong and put some of my 'trusties' on the watch and it's not long before the folks who pay for one apple and take three or for one peanut bar and take two find that they're caught themselves."

"Blind Al" has eyes in his fingers; in the keen powers of smell he has developed and in the redoubled acuteness of his ears. By these "detectives" he has corralled 18 counterfeiters and put the authorities on the trail of three bands who were making the spurious coins.

"I can almost always tell if a person is giving me bad money," said he. "The coins are always greasy and usually lighter than real ones; when I get them I keep them to take them out of circulation and then make the buyers give me good money."

Every day he fingers all the fruit with his brainy finger tips to tell if it is softening.

NOW WE GETTA MARRIED ALLA RICH!

CHICAGO.—The cave man of an eon ago, who did his wooing with a club and won his bride by stunning her and dragging her to his lair by the hair, was reincarnated the other night into the being of Dominick Provenzano, who, until the change, was a man of meekness and the keeper of a shoe shop at 2020 Roscoe street.

Provenzano wooed but failed to win Santo Donandola, a 17-year-old Italian girl who lived with her parents at 1110 Milton avenue and dreamed dreams of being courted by a prince. What cared she for the sad-eyed pleadings of Dominick? Huh! Her husband must be a man of daring.

And the other night Dominick qualified. With the spirit of his cave men ancestors suddenly awakened, he visited his brother-in-law, Samuel de Pasquala, forced his aid and then with a brandished revolver grimly led the way to the home of the unsuspecting bride-to-be.

Then with a savage cry the lover sprang toward his beloved, drove a handkerchief into her mouth with one hand and with the other lifted her from the doorstep and ran with her down the street.

In his wake came the faithful brother-in-law, and in the latter's came a mob of howling witnesses of the kidnaping.

De Pasquala held back the mob until he was beaten down, but the lover escaped with his prize.

Straight to the shoe store rushed Dominick. When the door to the shop finally was broken open by the police they found the girl, still gagged and now bound, lying on the floor and staring with wonder at the threatening face of the man. The gag was removed and then a strange thing happened.

"I love you!" she shouted. "I will marry you tomorrow! I—I didn't know you were like this."

So the police released the man and the girl went to her home to prepare for the wedding.

Mules Object to Service in Army and Desert

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Seventy-five mules, comprising the more energetic part of a delegation of three hundred of their kind that have reached San Francisco for the purpose of adding glory and efficiency to the United States army, suddenly decided not to enlist. As a result squads of cowboys, platoons of cavalrymen from the Presidio and deputies of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals passed a whole day galloping madly through the thoroughfares of the Mission district attempting to capture the deserters.

The three hundred mules were shipped into the city under consignment to the army authorities at the Presidio and were turned into corrals at Sixth and Berry streets to await the coming of the soldiers who were to be sent for them. They stood the confinement without protest for a few hours, but things were not very lively in the neighborhood, and, besides, the reception committee had deserted them and it didn't seem just right for so many strangers in the city to spend their first night penned up in a corral without a chance to see the sights.

It was some time after midnight when the fun started. A few well directed blows from the determined hoofs, and a breach was made in the fence surrounding the corral. Five minutes later seventy-five mules were scampering at top speed through the Mission, the clatter of their three hundred hoofs startling householders in quiet streets from their sleep and bringing frightened faces to windows of the houses they passed. With utter disregard of city ordinances, the visitors trampled over gardens and lawns and demolished everything in their path.

WHO'S WHO AND WHY

SOMETHING NEW IN ORGANIZED CHARITY

Before the state legislature in Albany, N. Y., this winter will be presented a plan for America's first "department of home assistance," the first organized government bureau to care for the destitute home. More than a generation ago governmental aid for the families of the very poor was abandoned in New York city. Living conditions—and living's cost—have changed radically since then; today the specially appointed committee of investigation for the city conference of charities and correction urges governmental aid as the only hope of real "social justice" and public support for the homes of the destitute. There are hundreds of women and children starving in New York for whom only the government can adequately care.

"Of course it is, primarily, a matter of the cost of living," said O. F. Lewis, chairman of the conference committee on governmental aid of New York city. "The price of the necessities of life has increased so much that destitution has become a problem too great for the private societies to meet alone."

AMIR OF AFGHANISTAN HELPS TURKEY

The specter of a holy war is unfolding itself before the eyes of Europe.

It began when Italy clashed with Turkey in Africa, and now that the little Christian states, that act as a buffer between the larger powers and Turkey, are at war, the cloud is darkening rapidly among all the Mohammedan nations.

In the mosques of India, the pagodas of Malaysia and the shrines of a dozen other nations prayers are being said for the success of the Turkish arms.

All Islam has thrown its religious support to the khalifate at Constantinople, and should the sultan, as head of the Moslem faith, unfurl the green flag of the prophet it is feared the fanatic Mohammedan nations would begin holy wars.

Even the most conservative of European diplomats admit there is a possibility of political alliances between Turkey and other Islamic nations. The Russian persecutions in Persia have fired the Mohammedans there, and the Asiatic Moslems are looking for a champion. The amir of Afghanistan is the man. At a meeting in Kabul recently he expressed his sympathy with the Turks in no uncertain manner.

MRS. GROVER CLEVELAND TO WED AGAIN

Mrs. Grover Cleveland, widow of the former president of the United States, is to be married next April to Prof. Thomas Preston, an honorary professor at Princeton University and now occupying the chair of archaeology at Wells College, Aurora, N. Y., the institution attended by Mrs. Cleveland, then Frances Folsom.

Although formal announcement has not been made and probably will not be made until after the debut of Miss Esther Cleveland this winter, the fact of the engagement has been known for some time among the intimate friends of Mrs. Cleveland and Professor Preston.

The second romance of the woman who as "the bride of the White House" charmed a nation and whose high character and devotion to her distinguished husband have been, by example, a national influence toward high ideals of wifehood, is the outcome of an acquaintanceship of little more than a year's duration, with a man practically unknown in America.

PRINCESS NURSING WOUNDED SOLDIERS

According to press reports from Greece, the hospital arrangements of the Greek army are entirely inadequate for emergencies. The army has acted with such rapidity that it is impossible for the field ambulances to keep pace with it. Princess Alice, wife of Prince Andrew, the fourth son of King George, with a staff of picked nurses, is following the army and rendering first aid to the wounded, by whom she is spoken of as "the ministering angel."

At Sarandoper she performed almost miracles, flitting with her staff from one quarter to another until late in the evening, when she was compelled to stop because her clothing was drenched with blood.

Looking around the railroad station at Larissa, which was littered with wounded men, some on ambulances, others propped against the walls, she exclaimed in pathetic tones:

"Only three weeks to prepare for all this! It was not enough time, and this is only the beginning."

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Diplomat's Wife Becomes a Newspaper Reporter

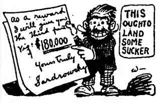
YOU WILL PUT MY NAME IN THE PAPER WONT YOU DEAR? !?! !!
SURE-LY !?!!

WASHINGTON.—Washington's diplomatic corps was thrown into a flurry of excitement when it was learned the other day that the wife of a former secretary here has joined the ranks of newspaper reporters.

Madame Louis Pastor, wife of Don Luis Pastor, of the Spanish diplomatic service, and formerly Miss Lee, of Baltimore, is the lady in question, and she has joined the army of women in Washington who are wage-earners. She has become society reporter for a New York daily. Diplomats at all posts take themselves very seriously, and the dignity that hedges about a foreign envoy is something little short of that which surrounds a sovereign. An ambassador at court precedes everyone but the heir to the throne, and though Senor Pastor was but a secretary of legation, his position was looked upon by his confreres with the same respect that is accorded any other member of a foreign court.

Senor Pastor began his diplomatic career in Washington under the Duke d'Arcos, who was then minister here, some 12 or 14 years ago, and who married Miss Lowery, a belle of Virginia, under romantic circumstances. Pastor remained here many years, when he was sent to another post, later coming back to Washington to resume his duties as second secretary. He was promoted to be first secretary, and while summering at Narragansett Pier, some five or six years ago, he met and wooed Miss Constance Cazenove Lee of Baltimore. They were married, and after a visit to Spain for the presentation of the young bride to court and her meeting with the husband's relatives, they came to Washington and established themselves in Q street.

Old Spanish Grandee Swindle in a New Guise



As a reward I will give you the third part viz: $180,000 Yours Truly Sadrowsky
THIS OUGHTO LAND SOME SUCKER

THE old, old confidence game, which was so overworked it became too well known to be effective, and was therefore sent into retirement, has "come back" and is again in our midst.

It is slightly disguised, however, probably in the hope that it will escape recognition.

Instead of the persecuted wealthy Spanish grandee with the lovely and beautiful daughter, who wished a little immediate assistance, for which later he was to give a fortune in repayment, under the new guise it is a noted Russian banker named Sadrowsky, who "eloped" from St. Petersburg with 5,000,000 rubles belonging to the bank.

He has a darling daughter, too, just like the Spaniard used to have, and he wishes to secure for her nearly half a million dollars that he has "planted" in America. He beseeches assistance in his effort to do this, and to the one rendering such assistance he will give $168,000.

He incloses what purports to be a clipping from an English paper, in which there is a detailed report of his arrest in London, of his absconding with the millions of rubles and being taken back to Spain, where he is held to await trial for shooting another Russian with whom he had quarreled.

The clipping also carefully states that Sadrowsky's portmanteaus were seized and carefully searched, but nothing except personal effects was found, "although the Russian ambassador declares that the prisoner ought to have several million rubles somewhere."

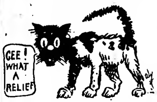
The clipping is inclosed with a letter promising $180,000 reward for assistance, with the following postscript:

"First of all, answer by cable, not by letter, as follows: To Luis Duran, Peso 6, Valladolid, Spain.

"Send news 12."

The letter is written in copperplate penmanship. The envelope in which it came bore Spanish stamps and was postmarked Madrid.

Cats of the Capital City Are Saved by Science



COMMON sense has administered another knockout to science, and the cause of human justice and feline liberty in the nation's capital still lives. A threatened outrage on the whole cat tribe of Washington has been averted, temporarily at least, and all the tabbies of the town, from the pampered parlor pets to the midnight songsters who grace our back fences, may now breathe a purr of relief. The district authorities have capitulated before the onslaught of an overwrought populace, and our city will be spared the frightful spectacle of cat hunts, with horse and hound, in the crowded thoroughfares of the metropolitan section.

This is the age of compromise, and authorities are to be congratulated upon having so readily adapted themselves to the spirit of the times, as they did in modifying their obnoxious impounding order. Hereafter the pound will send for stray cats "on request." Hordes of bloodthirsty huntsmen will not go out upon the highways and byways to slaughter the innocents. "On request!" On whose request? The cats'? Does the modification of the edict of St. Bartholomew—with the accent on the "mew"—mean that no cats will be sent for the poundmen unless they prefer a request? It is a delicate legal point and may not be settled until the supreme court has passed upon it.

However, as a temporary makeshift it will do. It gets us past a crisis.

"Pass Up" $14-a-Week Clerk Is Pastor's Advice

LITTLE DOLLY, SWEETHEART ANGEL PEACH, WILL YOU MARRY ME?
I MIGHT CONSIDER IT IF YOU EARN MORE THAN $14 A WEEK

"YOUNG women should pass up the $14-a-week clerk and go for bigger game when seeking husbands," said Rev. Earl Wilfley in a sermon the other night at Vermont Avenue Christian church. "Love cannot exist with a slimly furnished pantry and a bare, ill-furnished house. Always look to a young man's income and his abilities as a bread-winner before you marry him or fall deeply in love with him.

"Romantic love is one of the ills of this age. Too many of our people are inclined to tumble head over heels in love with each other and absolutely ignore the financial and practical side of life. If more attention were given the practical things I have no doubt that divorce would be cut to one-half its present high ratio.

"We should take lessons from the old Greeks in this matter of marriage. In those days a husband made a careful examination of his wife's fitness to take care of his household. There was no mushy sentiment about it either. It was a very practical piece of business. The young woman suited the husband. He in turn was carefully gone over by the young woman's parents. The two people being suitable for each other, they were married.

"What was the result? The young people lived happily together. Their temperaments were about the same, and they learned to love each other. Here in Washington and other cities of the east, where there are so many elopements, we find that the divorce courts thrive.

"I believe with Dr. Eliot that people should marry young. This prevents much immorality among both sexes. Old maidhood, however, is better than an unhappy married life or being a divorcee."

PEANUTS AND POLITICS.

It has been decided by the agricultural department that the peanut is not a nut. Like the regular pea, it belongs to the bean family, otherwise known as juguminosae. Down in its native country it is known as a "goober," "pieder," "ground pea," and other names, indicating its doubtful classification. Ground pea is a good name, for it is dug up from the ground like a potato. But there is one thing about the peanut which involves no doubt, and that is its fitness for baseball, the circus and sitting on a dry goods box and talking politics, says the Ohio State Journal. But dropping the peanut glory and coming to a golden memory, the former denizen of a village will remember how the dry goods stores would always put their empty boxes on the sidewalk, on which men would sit, whittle, chew tobacco and talk politics. Those were great tobacco chewing and spitting days, and politics chimed in happily with them. September and October were the best months for whittling up dry goods boxes and settling national affairs, and those were the days, too, of the peanut and plug tobacco—not the scrap stuff that ruins people nowadays, but real old Virginia plug, that was full of politics.

There was a time when the wholesome teachings of our mothers had an influence, when the home influence was felt after the fledglings had left the nest, and there are still some that are considered by many as "old-fashioned" who believe as our revered parents did, says the Washington Herald. Granting that a woman has the same rights as a man, that they can do the same things as man, can smoke, take a cocktail, ride a horse astride, and such things that were once considered as purely in man's province, yet the doing of these things have a tendency to bring the good woman down to the level of the company she is in, to make the telling of a risque story in mixed company a common matter. We discuss eugenics with our children; they are allowed to read almost any novel they can get their hands on, and are allowed liberties former generations were strangers to. A return to the "old-fashioned" ideas of our mothers, to the time when the conventionalities were observed, might be looked upon as a step backward by the fast set of today, but to the thinking man or woman who still believes in the sanctity of the home and home life it would help to establish a purity that is sadly lacking in many families in this the twentieth century.

Many persons are of the opinion that the wireless system of communication is particularly subject to tapping, but, according to the Scientific American, no telegraph system is absolutely secret. Any one familiar with the Morse code can read ordinary messages entering any telegraph office. At Poldhu, on a telephone connected to a long horizontal wire, the messages passing on a government telegraph line a quarter of a mile away can be distinctly read. It has been shown that it is possible to pick up at a distance, on another circuit, conversation which may be passing through a telephone or telegraph wire. On one occasion an investigator was able to interfere, for a distance, with the working of the ordinary telephones in Liverpool.

The first arrival in New York of specimens of the tsetse fly of the Congo was noted the other day. The flies were dead and preserved in a bottle of alcohol in the possession of A. H. Hale, who was a passenger on the steamship Finland. They will be available for examination by medical scientists who desire to study them at close range. The tsetse fly is the carrier of the sleeping sickness, which is said to have depopulated considerable districts in the heart of Africa. It is a biting fly. Recent students of the stable fly, which is under suspicion in this country, have said that it more nearly resembles the tsetse fly than any other American representative of the fly family. The specimens which Mr. Hale has brought into the country will enable comparisons to put this opinion to the test.

TRAINS CRASH; 15 DIE

SIXTEEN ARE BADLY INJURED

Indianapolis, Ind., Nov. 15.—According to the inspectors for the Indiana railway commission, the disastrous wreck on the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton railway at Irvington, a suburb, in which 15 persons lost their lives and 16 others were seriously injured on Wednesday, was the result of the company's failure to install a block system as it had been ordered to do by the commission some months ago.

Had this order been obeyed, the commission says, the wreck could not have occurred. The wreck was caused by the failure of the head brakeman to close the switch to a siding on which a heavy freight train had been run to let the rapidly running passenger train, which was more than an hour late, pass. Carl Gross, the head brakeman, has assumed blame for the disaster. He has not been arrested, but is under police guard at a hospital, where he lies with a broken leg.

After the wrecking crews had completed the search of the demolished passenger cars, the coroner's office here gave out the following list of dead and injured:

The dead: C. F. Gruendhoefer, Cincinnati; Albert Allen, Mrs. Albert Allen, Ben Boyle, William Sharkey, engineer, Indianapolis; Irvin M. Wiggins, conductor, Indianapolis; Clem Imholt, Los Angeles, Cal.; Horace B. White, brakeman, Indianapolis; J. L. Palmer, Itawaw, Tenn.; Charles Cheney, thirteen years old, Jackson, Ky.; Julia Cheney, wife of Clifton Cheney, Jackson, Ky.; Chester Cheney, five months old; John Cheney, fifty-two, Breathitt, Ky.; two-year-old daughter of Clifton Cheney, Jackson, Ky.; C. Burg, fireman.

The passenger train was No. 36 from Cincinnati to Chicago, and was running more than an hour late. The engineer was trying to make up time and at the time of the head-on collision with the heavy freight train on the siding was running more than 40 miles an hour. He had been given a clear track and had not apparently intended to slow up until he had entered the yard limits. Both he and his fireman were found dead in the cab of their engine, death being instantaneous, according to indications.

New Orleans, Nov. 13.—In a wreck on the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley railroad Monday, fourteen or more persons were killed, 92 severely injured and 50 slightly hurt. A freight train crashed into an excursion passenger train bound from New Orleans to Woodville, Miss.

Steals $25,000 Package.

Champaign, Ill., Nov. 16.—James Cain, rejected suitor of Miss Margaret Lowry, after attempting to kill her with a hammer Thursday, committed suicide by jumping in front of a train. Both were of good family.

U. S. TREASURER QUITS

LEE M'CLUNG RESIGNS; CARMI THOMPSON SLATED FOR JOB.

Resignation Means That All Moneys and Securities in Vaults Must Be Counted.

Washington, Nov. 16.—Announcement of the resignation of Lee McClung as treasurer of the United States was made by President Taft Thursday.

Mr. McClung tendered his resignation to the president at a conference at the executive mansion, and its acceptance was later announced by the president from the executive offices, with the explanation that Mr. McClung resigned voluntarily.

It is believed that Carmi Thompson, now private secretary to the president, will succeed him.

The resignation of Treasurer McClung means that money and securities for which the treasurer is responsible must be actually counted and receipted for.

This will be the greatest single financial transaction in the history of the world. When Mr. McClung assumed the duties of treasurer he gave a receipt to his predecessor for $1,260,134,946.88.

PANIC ON LAKE STEAMER

Benton Harbor, Mich., Nov. 15.—Passenger steamer Puritan of the G. & M. line, battered and damaged, was forced back to port here Thursday when she put out for Chicago in the teeth of a heavy northeast gale. Captain Morgan put his boat around and fought his way to port when part of her upper deck had been smashed by mountainous seas. Wireless was wrecked and the splendidly furnished cabin was flooded with water. The Puritan was heavily loaded with freight and carried a dozen passengers, who were panic stricken when the water flooded the cabin floor.

GIRL KILLS MOTHER ON TRAIN

Thought Parent Intruder in Berth—Police Arrest and Later Release Daughter—Tragedy Accident.

Trenton, N. J., Nov. 15.—Mrs. Elizabeth Myers of New York was shot and killed by her daughter on a Pennsylvania railroad train near here Wednesday. The daughter believed her mother was a burglar.

They were on their way from Salem, Va., to New York. The girl, Gladys, and a passenger, W. R. Cuthbert of Lynchburg, Va., were arrested by the police, but later was released.

Lorimer Will Go Under Knife.

Chicago, Nov. 15.—William Lorimer, former United States senator, will undergo an operation for the removal of his appendix at the Presbyterian hospital within a week or ten days.

This statement was made by his family physician, Dr. S. R. Slaymaker, who declared Mr. Lorimer has recovered from his attack of appendicitis, but that the operation will be performed as a precaution against future trouble.

DAM ENGULFS BOATS

WM. M. MOORE IS DROWNED

Bodies of Unfortunates Could Not Be Located—Accident Happens Near Beardstown, Ill.—Party Was En Route to St. Louis From Chicago.

Beardstown, Ill., Nov. 16.—Twelve miles above Beardstown, Ill., the A. P. Moore and the Five Dollar Bill, motorboats from Chicago bound for St. Louis on a pleasure trip, missed the La Grange locks, and one went over the dam. Four men are known to have been drowned.

The A. P. Moore disappeared in the river. The Five Dollar Bill, the larger of the two vessels, which was shoving the Moore, later followed its unfortunate consort.

There being no survivors, the cause of the accident could not be ascertained. It is believed, however, that the pilot of the Five Dollar Bill lost control of the steering gear and was unable to direct the boat into the locks.

Persons on the shore saw the two boats veering toward the dam, but were not alarmed, thinking that the pilot would soon turn toward the locks. Suddenly the craft seemed to gain speed, and the A. P. Moore fell over the dam and plunged into the river.

William M. Moore, owner of one of the motorboats, was on board the A. P. Moore and is among the drowned.

The Five Dollar Bill belongs to the Wackler Boat company of Chicago, and news of the disaster was sent to the owners from Beardstown.

The voyagers left Chicago Saturday and apparently were traveling leisurely toward St. Louis. Both boats had been newly painted and presented a gala appearance as they floated down the river toward St. Louis.

The information at hand seems to indicate that all members of the party were men.

Cries of help were heard early Thursday morning by Captain Kerr, keeper of the La Grange locks whose residence is about sixty yards' distance from the dam. From the window of his home he saw William Moore struggling in the water and finally sink to his death before assistance could reach him. Moore was married, but it is not known whether his wife was with him.

Captain Kerr saw but the one man. The names of Mr. Moore's companions are unknown. A searching party was organized and after carefully dragging the river, was unsuccessful in locating any bodies.

SCHRANK SAYS HE IS GUILTY

Roosevelt Assassin Declares He Shot Colonel as a "Menace," Not to Kill Citizen.

Milwaukee, Nov. 14.—Seeking to distinguish between an attack upon Roosevelt as a "menace" and an attack upon Roosevelt as a citizen, John Schrank pleaded guilty here Tuesday of attempting to murder Theodore Roosevelt in this city. Municipal Judge A. C. Backus announced after reading a petition from District Attorney Winifred C. Zabel, that later he would name a commission to examine into Schrank's mental condition.

The court appointed Attorney Joseph Flanders of Milwaukee to represent Schrank in the sanity hearing. The experts are expected to begin their examination immediately after being instructed by the court.

CALIFORNIA VOTE NEAR TIE

San Francisco, Nov. 16.—With one precinct missing and nine counties remaining to be canvassed officially, California gave Roosevelt a plurality of 56 over Wilson. The final result remained, however, in the keeping of three populous counties, which had not certified to their returns.

Boise, Idaho, Nov. 16.—Woodrow Wilson had a lead of 415 votes over President Taft on the latest returns. The vote now stands: Wilson, 32,826; Taft, 32,411. About 50 districts have not reported.

SIX KILLED IN EXPLOSION

Many Are Injured When Aetna Company's Plant Is Blown Up—Debris Scattered Over Mile Around.

Gary, Ind., Nov. 14.—Six men were killed outright and about thirty injured in an explosion which demolished pack house No. 3 of the Aetna Powder company, three miles east of Gary Tuesday. Between 1,000 and 2,000 pounds of new dynamite exploded, damaging other buildings and scattering debris over a mile of territory.

TURK PLEA IGNORED

BULGARIA MAKES NO REPLY TO REQUEST FOR ARMISTICE.

Ottoman Government Sends Direct Peace Plea to King Ferdinand—War Still Rages.

Constantinople, Nov. 16.—The Turkish government on Thursday had received no news from Sofia to indicate the nature of the reception by Bulgaria of the request for an armistice.

It is officially denied that an armistice has already been arranged.

Fighting has been resumed along the Tchetalje lines, after a cessation of hostilities that began on Sunday.

Belgrade, Servia, Nov. 16.—A report, coming from a reliable source, that the Turkish fortress of Adrianople has fallen before the attack of the Bulgarian and Servian allies, is current here, but without any confirmation in official circles.

London, Nov. 16.—Turkey, for years the domineering master of the Slavs of her domains, formally knelt in supplication before her one-time victims and asked for an armistice.

Bulgaria given the choice of negotiating with the view of granting such an armistice or continuing to punish the Turks until the powers stop her, has given no indication as to which of the two courses of action she will adopt; but her forces in the field are reported attacking without abatement the Turkish lines at Tchatalja and the forts of Adrianople.

Turkey's request for mediation was formally presented to the Bulgarian premier by the ministers of the great powers at Sofia, the Bulgarian capital.

The Bulgarian minister, Mr. Gleschoff, immediately transmitted the request to Ferdinand in the field and said he would confer on the matter with the cabinet of the Balkan allies.

TELEGRAPHIC NOTES

Washington, Nov. 15.—Col. David de la Fuente, General Orozco's chief of staff and formerly chief of police under President Madero in Mexico City, has been captured by American troops along the Texas border, according to war department dispatches.

Ottawa, Ont., Nov. 15.—Eleven persons probably perished when the steamboat Mayflower sank in the Madawaska river. A dispatch from Barry's bay, three miles from the scene of the disaster, said that there was little or no hope that any more of those aboard the Mayflower when she went down would be found alive.

Washington, Nov. 15.—Vilhjelmur Stefansson, the explorer, whose recent discovery of a tribe of blond Eskimos at Coronation gulf stirred the scientific world, announces that he would sail with an expedition from San Francisco or Seattle in June, 1913, on a three years' search for a continent supposed to exist in the arctic.

Camden, N. J., Nov. 15.—Justice Garrison sentenced Frederick Coursey, twenty-one years old, known as "Cowboy Pete," to meet death in the electric chair during the week beginning December 29, for the murder of Karl Kellman, eighteen years old, while attempting to rob him.

Steubenville, O., Nov. 15.—County Prosecutor Paisley was summoned to Columbus, where he will confer with Attorney-General Hogan concerning alleged election frauds in Jefferson county.

Washington, Nov. 13.—Secretary of State Knox made public here Monday the first of the flood of "resignations" which will come in from the diplomatic corps between now and March 4 next, that of Charles Page Bryan, ambassador to Japan. "Ill health and injuries received in a carriage accident" are given as the reasons for his resignation.

Cincinnati, O., Nov. 15.—The official count of Hamilton county, made public by the board of elections, shows that Congressman Nicholas Longworth, son-in-law of Col. Theodore Roosevelt, was defeated for congress in the first Ohio district by Stanley Bowdle, Democrat, by ninety-seven votes.

ANDERSON GETS JAPAN POST

Washington Man's Appointment as Ambassador to Be Announced at Once by President Taft.

Washington, Nov. 15.—Larz Anderson of Washington, now United States minister to Belgium, has been named ambassador to Japan, to succeed Charles Page Bryan, whose resignation was announced a few days ago.

Through the Japanese embassy it was learned that Mr. Anderson would be satisfactory to the Japanese government, and his appointment will be announced at once by President Taft.

Counterfeiter Gets Prison Term.

New York, Nov. 15.—Allison M. McFarland, acquitted of wife murder, pleaded guilty to counterfeiting in the United States district court Wednesday and was sentenced to one and one-half years in jail.

A PENALTY OF AGE

The tendency of advancing years to restrict activity and exercise is responsible for the constipated condition of most elderly people. The wear of years impairs the action of the bowels and the digestive organs are more sensitive to the demands upon them and rebel more quickly. Cathartics and purgatives are violent and drastic in their action and should not be used to correct constipation. A mild, yet positively effective remedy, and one that is recommended by physicians as well as by thousands who have used it, is the compound of simple laxative herbs with pepsin prescribed by Dr. W. B. Caldwell over thirty years ago and now sold by druggists everywhere under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Dr. Caldwell wants everyone troubled with constipation to try Syrup Pepsin and will send a trial bottle, free of charge, to all who write for it. Address Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 West St., Monticello, Ill. Adv.

CONTENTION WAS ALL RIGHT

Lawyer, However, Qualified Admission With a Remark That Had Unkind Sound.

The jury was hearing the closing arguments in a damage suit before Judge Ben M. Smith, in which slander was alleged. The attorney for the plaintiff had been directing his broadsides against the defendant for his show of ingratitude, when the latter's counsel objected.

"Gratitude is inspiring but not a constitutional requirement," interposed the objector, who had borrowed several law books from the other lawyer some time before.

"One look at your face convinces me that you are right," said the first lawyer. "If gratitude were a constitutional requirement you couldn't be a citizen."—Chicago Evening Post.

ROAD FUND GIVEN

RAIL TAX IS IN DOUBT.

Seven-Senator Bill Meets Crushing State Defeat—Predictions Fulfilled—Vote Given By Counties.

St. Paul.—With the vote from nineteen counties on constitutional amendments tabulated, a comparatively definite line on the final result has been determined in the office of Julius A. Schmahl, secretary of state. Only figures on three of the amendments were compiled, the increase of the road and bridge tax, the increase of the railroad gross earnings tax and the so-called seven-senator bill.

Apparently the amendment authorizing the increase of the road tax to 1 mill will carry with a safe majority. The increase of the railroad gross earnings tax will have a rub, and not until final tallies are made will it be known what fate the amendment has met. The seven-senator amendment unquestionably is lost.

The affirmative vote in the nineteen counties follows:

County.	Vote.	Road Tax.	Gross Earnings.	Seven-Senator.

Seven-Senator Plan Fails.

Vote on the seven-senator amendment, so far as tabulated, shows that its unfairness was evident to all sections of the state. Its defeat was predicted immediately after the Moonan-Duxbury-Hoycraft-Weiss "frame-up" got it through the Senate at the 1911 session. The vote on the increased railroad gross earnings amendment, however, causes some surprise, because it was believed the voters of the state were awaiting an opportunity to "swat" the roads for increasing the passenger rate to 3 cents a mile and opposing freight rate reductions ordered by the Railroad and Warehouse commission. However, there is a strong possibility of this amendment having carried, and early indications are that the balance is in its favor.

There is little doubt, apparently, that the R. C. Dunn road tax amendment has pulled through safely. Only a majority of all votes cast is necessary to pass a constitutional amendment, and the road tax proposal has more than that in the votes thus far counted.

Six Carry in Ramsey.

Six of the seven propositions submitted to voters passed in Ramsey county. The total vote cast was 32,261. It required a majority of this vote to pass the propositions. Six were amendments to the constitution and one was for increasing the gross earnings tax on railways from 4 to 5 per cent. The seven-senator amendment was the only one to fail.

The amendment providing a 1-mill tax for road improvement got an affirmative vote of 21,272 and 3,922 against.

For the hail insurance measure there were 17,914 votes for and 4,493 against.

The vote for the gross earnings tax increase was 19,485 for and 4,682 against.

For the amendment of the home rule charter section there were 18,773 votes for and 3,814 against.

The amendment authorizing school fund loans on farms got 18,752 affirmative votes and 3,401 against.

The amendment making school superintendents educators got 18,834 votes for and 3,109 against.

For the amendment limiting state senators to seven from any one county, 11,827 for and 10,013 against.

Dog Causes Accident.

St. Cloud.—Four men were injured, a new Ford automobile was wrecked and a business trip was spoiled, but the dog that caused all the trouble escaped unharmed. George R. Whitney of this city was one of a party of four to leave Royalton on a business trip. While going at twenty miles an hour the machine hit a farmer's dog and turned over, pinning the four men underneath. Mr. Whitney had three fingers injured, Mr. Keeher of Royalton was injured internally, Mr. Loxechs sustained two broken ribs and Peter Moeller had a sprained leg, but when they emerged from beneath the machine the dog was capering about ready to enter the fray again.

State Bank Changes Hands.

Sauk Center.—The First State Bank of Sauk Center, which now has a capital stock of $25,000 changed hands, the entire Kells interests being sold. Lucas Kells, president, founded the bank in 1880 and conducted it as a private bank until three years ago, when it was made a state bank. The purchasers are: J. A. Caughren, J. A. Dubois, J. F. Cooper and Thos. Sullivan of Sauk Center and M. F. Woodbury of Hornell, N. Y., and A. G. Whitney of St. Cloud.

THANKSGIVING DAY PROCLAMATION

Issued by Governor Eberhart.

The return of another Thanksgiving season finds the people of Minnesota with more cause for sincere gratitude toward the Supreme Giver of Good Gifts than at any other period in the history of the state, for at no time in that history has there been larger and more widespread prosperity, and more convincing evidence of marked advance along the lines of right thinking and humane and unselfish conduct, tending to the mental and spiritual uplift of this great commonwealth.

Many of the great sociological problems of the hour are being seriously studied and gradually worked out in this state, while encouraging progress is being made along all lines of material development.

It is fitting, therefore, in recognition of those most gratifying conditions and in conformity with the proclamation of the president of the United States, that I join with him in designating Thursday, the 28th day of November, 1912, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer throughout the state, and I earnestly recommend the observance of the day by a revival of the spiritual enthusiasm that marked the establishment of this annual custom in the trying hours of a young and struggling nation.

ADOLPH O. EBERHART,
Governor.

Wells Host to Convention.

Wells.—The annual Mankato district Y. P. A. convention was held at Rice Lake and ended on Sunday. Rev. J. Moede, president of the district Y. P. A., Rev. L. Reep of Sleepy Eye and Rev. Kachel of Blue Earth made addresses. Professor Umbach of Northwestern college, Naperville, Ill., preached the convention sermon, and also gave two lectures, "With Christ in the Holy Lands," and "The Young Man Four Square." Sunday afternoon he spoke on "Our Educational Interests." The convention closed with an address by Rev. Mr. Schoenlahen, presiding elder of the district. At the business session the following officers were elected: President, Rev. E. H. Bollebach; vice president, Rev. S. Hellscher; treasurer, Fremont Willmert; junior superintendent, Mrs. E. H. Bollebach. It was decided to hold next year's meeting at Marshall. Miss Roena Shaner, who gave an interesting address on temperance, was voted $25.

Panic in Theater.

Winona.—While playing basketball in the opera house in Trempealeau, Wis., near here, Saturday night, one of the members of the boy scouts' team noticed that a lamp with which the room was lighted was burning low and sought to fill it from one of two cans while the game was interrupted. The large lamp was removed from the socket in the center of the hall and the oil was poured into the basin. A match was applied to the burner, and the game was about to be resumed when a terrific explosion occurred. There was a wild scramble for the exits among the players and the spectators when the burning fluid was scattered to all parts of the room. All escaped in safety, but the large wooden building immediately took fire, the room filling with dense black smoke.

Brewster Succeeds Gray.

Fargo.—Fred O. Brewster, resident of Harvey, was chosen chairman of the state Republican central committee to succeed George M. Gray recently deceased. The committee announced that active headquarters will be maintained for the coming years for educational purposes. The committee went on record with the declaration that factionalism was eliminated in North Dakota and would be succeeded by Republicanism. J. W. Foley was announced as private secretary to Governor Hanna.

Minnesota Girl Victorious.

Fergus Falls.—News has been received from Walla Walla, Wash., to the effect that Mrs. Josephine Preston of that place has won the superintendency of schools of the state of Washington by a plurality of over 10,000. Mrs. Preston was formerly Miss Corliss, daughter of John Corliss, of this city, and a niece of E. E. Corliss, the state capitol custodian. She had two opponents for the state superintendency.

Will Refuse More Paupers.

St. Cloud.—In the future all cities that have been sending their paupers to St. Cloud will receive their charges back by the next train, according to a decision of the city commissioners. The practice in the past has been to keep these transients moving, but in the future they will be returned to the city they last left.

Interurban is Nearly Ready.

Moorhead.—With the completion of the electric line from Moorhead to Dilworth this week, this section of Minnesota will have its first interurban line in operation. For the present time ordinary street cars will be run hourly between Moorhead and Dilworth, and later several fine cars of interurban type will be installed. The next step contemplated by the Fargo & Moorhead Street Railway company is the extension of the line to Detroit lake district of Minnesota.

BOY CRUSHED BY AUTOMOBILE

TEN-YEAR-OLD JOSEPH LeMUER IS FATALLY INJURED.

Peter Johnson, Driver of the Machine, Is Grief-Stricken Over Accident.

Minneapolis, Nov. 13.—The seventh fatal automobile accident within the last two months occurred when Joseph Le Muer, 10 years old, the only son of John Le Muer, employed at the Leamington hotel, was struck by a car driven by Peter Johnson on Franklin avenue, between Ninth and Tenth avenue south, and so badly hurt that he died two hours later in the Swedish hospital.

Johnson, who is being held in Central station, is utterly broken down over the accident, although he has not been told of the death of the child. He is said by the police to be the only one of the many who have been arrested for a similar offense to show any emotion.

It is said that the boy had caught onto a city dump wagon and that he was clinging to the rear of the dump cart when the collision occurred.

Peter Johnson, the driver of the machine, said that he saw the cart ahead of him. Both were driving west on Franklin avenue. Suddenly, Johnson says, the cart seemed to stop, and he threw on his brakes, but the pavement was wet and his car skidded into the cart with considerable force.

The boy was struck and thrown to one side. His skull was fractured, as were the upper and lower jaws on the right side. His head was otherwise bruised, but not his body, which would indicate that he was not run over.

The driver of the cart said that he was turning into an alley to get to his home at the time, and that it would appear that he momentarily stopped. The force of the collision was so great that a wheel was taken off his wagon.

MAN TIPPED OUT.

Arthur Blackhurst of Deer River Meets Death in Pelican Lake.

Elk River.—Arthur Blackhurst, who has been working at Otsego, and whose home is at Deer River, Minnesota, was drowned late Sunday at Pelican Lake, near St. Michaels and about ten miles southwest of here. He and his employer, Ed. Koechli of Otsego, had been hunting ducks on the lake in a small wooden boat. Koechli left the lake a short time before the accident and it is not known how it occurred.

Farmers heard the cries of the drowning man and at once hurried to his rescue. They could see him hanging to one end of the boat which was overturned, struggling to keep above the surface. Before they could reach him he had disappeared.

Several efforts were made to recover the body, but the searchers were not successful. The Minneapolis authorities were communicated with for assistance and the search will be continued tomorrow morning.

CROWDS AT LAND SHOW.

Minneapolis.—The seven thousand people in attendance tells the story of the successful opening of the Northwestern Land Products exposition at the new armory annex. Last year, during its 10 days, the admissions at the St. Paul land show, in December, totaled nearly 100,000, and the prediction has been made that the attendance at the Minneapolis show this year will be one-third larger. Judging from the attendance on the opening day it will be double.

The conservation congress to be held four days of next week at the armory can be expected to add many thousands of visitors in addition to those attracted by the land show itself.

COST TOO MUCH.

Asks Court Price of a Blow, Then Decides to Curb Wrath.

St. Paul, Minn.—"What do you fine a man for hitting another?" asked a nicely dressed youth of Judge Hanft of St. Paul just as municipal court was adjourned.

"Anywhere from $5 to $100," replied the judge. "Have you been struck?"

"No," replied the inquirer. "I was just thinking about hitting a fellow."

"Well," replied the astonished judge, "under the circumstances you had better wait at least two weeks, for if you come before me I'll give you the limit." The two weeks' limit given the man meant the expiration of the judge's monthly term on the criminal bench.

"That's too dear," said the man with a grudge. "I guess I won't hit him."

W. J. Burns Possible Police Chief.

Minneapolis.—A special committee of representative Minneapolitans have launched a project to secure William J. Burns for the position of chief of police of Minneapolis. The subject was broached by James Ford Bell and Eugene J. Carpenter. Mr. Bell announced that he would be willing to head a committee to secure a subscription that would make it worth Mr. Burns' while. According to Mr. Carpenter, the city should have one of the best police officials in the country at the head of its police force.

TERROR REIGNS IN TURK ARMY

AS SEEN BY CORRESPONDENTS

Soldiers Claw Each Other for Food—Wounded From Tchatalja Seek Refuge in Capital as Bulgars Push Their Advantage.

Paris, Nov. 13.—Jean Rodes, a staff correspondent of the Temps, who has reached Constantinople from the war zone, sends a vivid picture of the misery of the Turkish soldiers and the disorganization of the Turkish army.

"We have witnessed the failure of the Turk as a soldier," says Rodes. "We have seen him dying of hunger, worn out by fatigue, wrecked by suffering, and running away after having abandoned his place in the combat.

"I have never seen a more poignant picture of human distress than that presented by these unhappy men, thrown into one of the most terrible wars in history without food, without medical attention, almost without chiefs, almost without arms. At Seidler I saw a soldier whose right hand had been severed hold out to us, begging for medical help, the bleeding stump around which he had tied a piece of twine.

"I saw long lines of famished men who came to our tent begging for a crumb of bread and staggering away without a murmur of complaint when told that we had none to give. I saw a thousand wounded leaving a trail of blood as they dragged themselves toward Tchorlu. I saw hundreds of others fall by the wayside dying from wounds and fatigue.

Soldiers Fight for Food.

"At Tchorlu a column of soldiers, terrible in appearance, staggered through the streets in a driving rain and wind storm. No one paid any attention to them. They had no shelter, nothing to eat. From a near-by bakery an officer threw out handfuls of bread and the soldiers fought for the loaves. More than half of them got nothing, and turned away, ragged, pallid, and weak.

"All the houses were closed. Practically all the population had fled, and those who remained barricaded themselves within, trembling with fear. The soldiers knocked vainly at the barred doors.

"Groups shivering in the cold tried the doors of stables to seek refuge; even the stables remained inhospitable. Refugees smashed their way into shops and devoured all they found, including raw vegetables and candles, and sucked at pieces of greasy wood.

Calls It Image of Inferno.

"I never saw such an image of inferno. One of the most miserable of the wanderers succeeded in getting into a house where we were staying, drenched to the skin and teeth chattering. 'Take all my money; take my clothing, if you will,' he cried, 'but I beg of you to give me some bread.'

"I questioned him. He said he came from Asia Minor and had not eaten for eight days. I gave him a slice of bread and a chocolate tablet, and he went away to join the remnants of the retreating army, of which this was the end.

"Thus did the Turkish soldier appear to me. He seemed to have no understanding of the great drama in which he was participating, but his infinite misery and his horrible animal distress were enough to break one's heart.

"I do not know whether the accusations of a massacre are exact, but so far as I have observed, I can affirm that not only have the Turks committed no excesses but I believe that no army in the world under such frightful circumstances would have been more moderate, more docile."

Properly Qualified.

The Youth—Sir, I came to ask your consent to my marriage with your daughter.

The Youth—It is; and, in addition to that, it is sufficient to enable me to stand an occasional touch from my wife's father.

The Old Man—Say no more, young man. She's yours. Bless you, my son.

Maybe She Has.

Gladman—I think my wife has decided to give up bridge and afternoon teas.

Sadman—On what do you base your idea?

Gladman—I found a button sewed on my shirt that had been missing for months.

The Result.

"No shams for me!" declared Jones.

The result in the house was a pillow fight.

Onward and Upward.

"So you are going to be a grand opera singer?"

"Only for a little while," replied the ambitious young vocalist. "Just long enough to get a reputation which will enable me to establish a business in educating people in how to reduce weight and become beautiful."

The Alternative.

"Will they hang your client?"

"Not if we can manage to hang the jury."

HOW GIRLS MAY AVOID PERIODIC PAINS

The Experience of Two Girls Here Related For The Benefit of Others.

Rochester, N. Y.—"I have a daughter 18 years old who has always been very healthy until recently when she complained of dizziness and cramps every month, so bad that I would have to keep her home from school and put her to bed to get relief.

"After giving her only two bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound she is now enjoying the best of health. I cannot praise your Compound too highly. I want every good mother to read what your medicine has done for my child."—Mrs. RICHARD N. DUNHAM, 311 Exchange St., Rochester, N.Y.

Stoutsville, Ohio.—"I suffered from headaches, backache and was very irregular. A friend advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and before I had taken the whole of two bottles I found relief. I am only sixteen years old, but I have better health than for two or three years. I cannot express my thanks for what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me. I had taken other medicines but did not find relief."—Miss CORA B. FOSNAUGH, Stoutsville, Ohio, R.F.D., No. 1.

Hundreds of such letters from mothers expressing their gratitude for what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has accomplished for their daughters have been received by the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Company, Lynn, Mass.

His Mistake.

After the services were over, one of the congregation turned to his wife and said:

"On my way to church I picked up a button and put it in my change pocket, where I had a quarter."

"Gracious, my dear!" anticipated his wife, very much horrified. "And you dropped it into the collection basket by mistake?"

"No, confound it!" replied her husband, "I put in the quarter."—Judge.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

We are publishing three columns of election returns this week. Read them over and see how it happened.

While we do not claim to be a calamity howler, yet we are of the opinion, that the farmers, and particularly the farmers of this new country had better be careful and pay up all the debts possible instead of contracting new ones, expecting the present prices for farm products to continue.

Congressman Steenerson will leave for Washington this week to be on hand for the next session of congress, which meets next month. He can go down there feeling that he has the indorsement of the people of his district behind him, as he certainly was re-elected by an overwhelming majority.

We would like to hear from the people of eastern Pennington county regarding the getting of an act through congress declaring the Red Lake River unnavigable, and taking it out from under the control of that war department and naming it Red Lake Creek. We can then get bridges across it, as it is an easy river to bridge, if it was not for that solid government fence. As that river now is, it is a serious draw back to the upbuilding of this part of the county, and there is no more excuse for the government to keep that creek under their control than there would be for them to stretch a wire across the country and forbidding the people to cross it, unless they built a bridge 32 feet high.

The setting dredge on ditch 47 is again abandoned with no prospect of this ditch being completed this fall. Part of the work has been fairly done this season but down near the town line of Deer Park Township the dirt has been put so close to the ditch that it is caving in and filling up the ditch now. There was no effort made by the petitioners to have this ditch resold as long as there was any prospect that the present contractors would complete it, but now that they have abandoned it, an effort will be made to have the ditch resold to some contractor that will put a decent dredge at the upper end of it and dig the ditch as per contract. So far the digging that has been done is a damage to the country as there is no outlet for the water.

President elect Wilson will call a special session of congress to revise the tarrif, but it is to be hoped that he will not bring on a Grover Cleveland panic, but tinkering with the tarrif is a dangerous proposition as the American people have found out. President Wilson has promised the consumers a cheaper price for what they have to buy, but if he don't step careful he will deprive them of any money to buy with. It is better for a consumer to pay $1.00 a bushel for potatoes, and 18c a pound for meat when he has the cash to pay for them, than to see fine potatoes on display at 25c a bushel and choice beef steak at 8c a pound, and him without a cent in his pocket to buy a bushel of potatoes, or a pound of meat with.

Such Wasting.

"Is that so?" chirped Mrs. Wonder. "My favorite aunt had it and the poor thing just wasted away!"—Birmingham Age-Herald.

A Review of the Election

New Governors of States and Probable United States Senators.

Political Complexion of House, Electoral College and Popular Vote.

By JAMES A. EDGERTON.

THERE was an election held in the United States of America the other day. You may have heard of it. It may not have attracted much attention in Mars or the Milky way, but it certainly made some dent in this planet. It was a mixture of landslide, Armageddon, the judgment day and a political earthquake. An elephant and bull moose were buried somewhere in the debris, and a donkey and Democratic rooster emerged from the ruins making joyful sounds. But to get down to cases:

In this election there were chosen a president and vice president of the United States, legislatures to choose thirty-five members of the United States senate, determining the political complexion of that body, 435 members of the national house of representatives, governors in more than thirty states and thousands of minor officials. In the electoral college the Democrats have so many votes that it seems a shame to count them. The senate is close, but the Democrats are claiming at least fifty votes out of ninety-six, with some states yet doubtful. The house is Democratic by nearly 170 majority, while the Democrats have likewise chosen a majority of the governors.

The New Senate.

Alabama	Bankhead* (Dem.)
Arkansas	Davis* (Dem.)

South Carolina	Tillman* (Dem.)
South Dakota	Sterling (Rep.)
Tennessee	A Democrat
Texas	Sheppard (Dem.)
Virginia	Martin* (Dem.)
West Virginia	A Republican
Wyoming	Warren (Rep.)

Those marked with a star have been elected. As the Democrats have thirty holdover senators this would indicate that they would have forty-nine, or a majority of two, with a chance still to win one in Illinois, where no party has a majority in the legislature.

Utah	John F. Tolton (Dem.)
Washington	Ernest Lister (Dem.)
W. Virginia	H. D. Hatfield (Rep. and Prog.)
Wisconsin	F. E. McGovern (Rep.)

In New Hampshire the legislature will choose the Republican candidate, since no one had a majority in the election. In Kansas the fight is so close between Capper (Rep.) and Hodges (Dem.) that the official count will be required to decide. Capper claims it by 58 and Hodges by 50.

In Tennessee the result was very close between McMillin (Dem.) and Hooper (Rep.). In Delaware there was only about 1,000 between Miller and Monaghan (Dem.).

The Progressives claim more members than this table shows, since some classed as Republicans in Pennsylvania and elsewhere really belong to the new party. It will be impossible to determine exactly how many there are of these until the new congress meets and the members in question declare by their caucus affiliations to which party they belong.

In the First Ohio district the fight between Longworth (Rep.), son-in-law of Colonel Roosevelt, and his Democratic opponent was so close that it was in doubt for several days.

Among those who went down in the landslide were Uncle Joe Cannon and William B. McKinley, Taft's manager, in Illinois; Ebenezer J. Hill in Connecticut and other warhorses of the Republican party. Victor J. Berger, the lone Socialist member, was defeated, although the Socialists throughout the nation showed surprising gains, practically doubling their vote. Woman suffrage also won four new states, Michigan, Kansas, Oregon and Arizona, making ten states in all where women will hereafter have the ballot.

*South Dakota went for Roosevelt, but it is claimed that the electors are pledged to Taft.

So far as mere numerical majority goes, this is the most decisive vote in the history of the electoral college. This is partially due to the fact, however, that the college is now much larger than ever before. Washington received the unanimous vote of the electors, and Monroe all but one. Among other decisive results in the past may be mentioned the following: In 1832 Andrew Jackson received 219 electoral votes to 49 for Henry Clay, 11 for John Floyd and 7 for William Wirt. In 1840 William Henry Harrison had 234 to 60 for Martin Van Buren. In 1852 Franklin Pierce had 254 to 42 for General Winfield Scott. In 1864 Abraham Lincoln received 212 to 21 for General George B. McClellan. Grant received tremendous electoral majorities both times, 214 to 80 for Horatio Seymour in 1868 and 286 to 63 for several candidates following the death of Horace Greeley in 1872. In 1904 Theodore Roosevelt received 336 to 140 for Alton B. Parker.

Yet, notwithstanding his phenomenal majority in electors and his great popular plurality over either Taft or Roosevelt, it is one of the anomalies of the situation that President Elect Wilson received an actual minority of the vote and possibly fell short of the Bryan vote in 1908. The following table shows the complete vote in a few states and close approximations in the others:

It will be weeks before the official count is made in most of the states; and until that time comes it will be impossible to give the popular vote in full. All these totals will be somewhat increased, but will retain approximately the same relative positions.

Comparing this vote with that of 1908, which was—Taft, 7,678,908; Bryan, 6,409,104, it is seen that Wilson is about 140,000 short of Bryan's vote and that the combined Taft and Roosevelt vote is more than 2,000,000 short of Taft's vote four years ago. As already stated, however, complete and official returns may change these results.

Wilson's plurality over Roosevelt is above 2,000,000 and over Taft is nearly 2,700,000. Roosevelt received more than 500,000 over Taft. Wilson is 1,400,000 behind the combined vote of Roosevelt and Taft.

Other Minority Presidents.

He is not by any means the first president who has been elected by a minority vote. In 1892 Grover Cleveland received a large majority of the electoral vote, but his popular vote was 5,556,918 to 5,176,108 for Harrison, 1,041,028 for Weaver (Populist), 264,133 for Bidwell (Prohibition) and 21,164 for Wing (Socialist Labor). In other words, the combined vote of other candidates was 6,502,433, nearly 1,000,000 more than Cleveland.

Four years earlier Mr. Harrison won, although he had fewer votes than Mr. Cleveland. The figures were: Harrison, 5,440,216; Cleveland, 5,538,233; other candidates, 402,411. Thus Harrison was nearly 100,000 behind Cleveland and 500,000 short of the combined opposition.

In the close and exciting Cleveland-Blaine contest of 1884 the Democratic candidate was ahead of Mr. Blaine but slightly behind the total vote of opposing candidates. The result was: Cleveland, 4,911,017; Blaine, 4,848,334; St. John (Prohibition), 151,809; Butler (Greenback), 133,825. Thus, while Cleveland led Blaine by 62,683, he was behind the combined opposition by 222,051.

In fact, minority presidents have been the rule. Garfield was one. He was a slight 7,000 ahead of Hancock, but more than 300,000 behind all opponents. The figures were: Garfield, 4,449,053; Hancock, 4,442,035; Weaver (Greenback), 307,306; Dow (Pro.), 10,305; Phelps (Amer.), 707.

Hayes Far Behind.

Hayes was still more in the minority, being 250,000 behind Tilden and nearly 345,000 behind all candidates. The result was: Hayes, 4,033,950; Tilden, 4,284,885; Cooper (Greenb.), 81,740; Smith (Pro.), 9,522, and Walker (Amer.), 2,636.

Grant was ahead of all other candidates in both his races, as was Lincoln in his second race, but in 1860 the great emancipator was elected by a minority. The figures were: Lincoln, 1,866,352; Douglas, 1,375,157; Breckenridge, 845,763; Bell, 589,581. Thus the combined opposition was 2,810,501, which was nearly 1,000,000 ahead of Mr. Lincoln's vote. That was the nearest parallel to the present election, for the Democratic party was split then as the Republican party is split now.

James Buchanan was a minority president. His vote was 1,838,169 to 1,341,264 for Fremont and 874,534 for Millard Fillmore (Amer.), thus leaving Buchanan nearly 400,000 behind the combined opposition.

Franklin Pierce had a majority over all, but four years earlier Zachary Taylor was elected by a minority vote. He received 1,360,101 to 1,220,544 for Lewis Cass and 291,263 for Martin Van Buren (Free Soil), thus being 150,000 behind the total vote of his opponents.

The same was true of James K. Polk in 1844. He received 1,337,243 to 1,299,068 for Henry Clay and 62,300 for James G. Birney, leaving Polk nearly 25,000 behind the two.

The elder Harrison had a clear majority in 1840, as did Van Buren in 1836 and Jackson in both of his contests, but in 1824 John Quincy Adams was elected by a minority, the vote being: Adams, 105,321; Jackson, 155,872; Clay, 46,587, and Crawford, 44,282. Adams was 50,000 behind Jackson and more than 140,000 behind all. Yet he was chosen by the electoral college.

This carries us back to the beginning of the convention and party system. Since that system began a majority of our presidents have been elected by a minority of the popular vote.

Simon Solberg was up this week looking after his flax harvest, which it is hoped will be completed before Thanksgiving.

The dam that the Dredges on Ditch 55 had built sprung a leak last Sunday night and let their water escape into Red Lake River, which caused the loss of one days digging.

President Taft is out with his Thanksgiving proclamation, and the most the people have to be thankful for is that he goes out of office next March, Would'nt a steamboat with a smoke stack 32 feet high look funny going up Red Lake River when you could not get water enough out of it to water a cow.

When you are standing on the bank of Red Lake River looking for a boat, dont you often wish that you had a bridge to walk across on.

If Clearwater River was a Navigable River the people would still be fording it instead of having good steel bridges across it, and yet the people up on this river have to go down to Clearwater River to get ice in the winter as this Navigable River is dry.

Erricksons are having lots of trouble with their Separator, as it will not save the flax. We understand that they will order a new one to complete their falls work.

Editor Lattimore, of the Eleven Towns is down to Thief River Falls this week explaining how it happened that Taft only got 9 votes in the town of Highlanding. "Come take something."

Erricksons have a brand new advance separator, which will be here on next Wednesday, that will thresh and save flax to perfection. He has cast his J.I.Case Separator aside, as it wasted more grain than it saved,

The Democrats will have the President and a good majority in both houses of Congress at the special Session to be called next March. So they can not lay any mistakes that may be made onto the Republican party.

Where the dredge left off digging on Ditch 47, this week there is a 11 feet cut to go through. The water is now running out over the top of the ditch and flooding the low lands north of it, and will cause thousands of dollars damage to people living along the Ditch. Surely the poor tax payers who petitoned for ditch 47 got it in the neck proper, but are only entitled to nominal damages says our wise County Attorney.

NOTICE

The annual Short Course in connection with the agricultural high school at Thief River Falls will open for the winter terms on Monday, December 2nd, and continue until the spring holidays. This is a part of the extension work required of all Putnam high schools and it will be organized on similar lines to that of last year and will be made as practical and useful as possible.

The subjects taught will include the common branches, agriculture, accounting, some typewriting, cooking, sewing, carpentry and blacksmithing

The arithmetic will deal exclusively with practical problems and with work closely related to the activities of the student. The book keeping will comprise the study of ordinary accounts, as well as of the various forms and uses of commercial paper; it will also include a brief review of commercial law. Agriculture will deal with farm crops, dairying, stock raising and judging, farm mechanics. The latter will permit of the attendance at a school for gas trator engines in this city, as well as the handling of various forms of smaller gas engines at the Lincoln building. Carpentry and iron work will permit the students to make iron articles for use at home, such as wagons, sleighs, wagon boxes, wheelbarrows, etc. Model frame barns and truss bridges will also be constructed. The cooking and sewing will meet the needs of those taking this work.

Any resident of the state who is over 16 years of age is eligible to enroll for the course; regardless of other qualifications. Lack of book knowledge ought not to keep any ambitious young person from enrolling, and the course will be especially planned for those who can attend school but a few winter months, whether they come from city or country.

Books are loaned to the students and there is absolutely no cost whatever to the students, except that the wood and iron used in the shops will be sold at cost.

The students will be welcomed to all athletic and literary organizations in the high school. Board and room can be easily secured at reasonable rates in good homes in this city.

Further particulars will be furnished by the undersigned on application.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

The Puzzle of Living.

Religionists who do not agree might point out that they differ only in incidentals and not essentials, whereas the scientists differ on everything. Take the science of living. A week ago you would have "died if you drank water with your meals." Now they say it doesn't do any harm at all. One variety says, "Eat meat, lots of it, to build good, rich blood." Another says meat is poison; that vegetables are the only food. A third declares meat and vegetables both increase debility and that you will live as long on raw fruits and nuts. Some say: "Talk with your meals, laugh, it makes the food digest." Others insist silence is better so golden as at table.—Pittsburgh Press.

Diana of the Air.

The beautiful and athletic Eleanora Sears, at a luncheon at Sherry's, said of aviation:

"I like the biplane well enough, and the monoplane I am simply head over heels in love with."

"Ah, another case of man being supplanted by machinery!"

Farms for Children.

Perhaps the smallest farms in the world, each four by eight feet, have been devised by Mrs. Henry Parsons for the International Children's School Farm league, and demonstrated in New York. Each child becomes owner of his diminutive farm, in which he works, grows and harvests seven different kinds of vegetables, and these are borne by him in triumph to his family. About each farm is an 18-inch path, which he keeps in order; under his instructor it becomes a tiny object lesson in good roads.

SCOFFERS

Often Make the Staunchest Converts.

The man who scoffs at an idea or doctrine which he does not fully understand has at least the courage to show where he stands.

The gospel of Health has many converts who formerly laughed at the idea that coffee and tea, for example, ever hurt anyone. Upon looking into the matter seriously, often at the suggestion of a friend, such persons have found that Postum and a friend's advice have been their salvation.

"My sister was employed in an eastern city where she had to do calculating," writes an Okla. girl. "She suffered with headache until she was almost unfitted for duty.

"Her landlady persuaded her to quit coffee and use Postum and in a few days she was entirely free from headache." (Tea is just as injurious as coffee because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.) "She told her employer about it, and on trying it, he had the same experience.

"My father and I have both suffered much from nervous headache since I can remember, but we scoffed at the idea advanced by my sister, that coffee was the cause of our trouble.

"However, we finally quit coffee and began using Postum. Father has had but one headache now in four years, due to a severe cold, and I have lost my headaches and sour stomach, which I am now convinced came from coffee.

"A cup of good, hot Postum is satisfying to me when I do not care to eat a meal. Circumstances caused me to locate in a new country and I feared I would not be able to get my favorite drink, Postum, but I was relieved to find that a full supply is kept here with a heavy demand for it." DAVID WON A WIFE

By AUGUSTUS GOODRICH SHERWIN.

There was only one ray of light visible about the plant of the Interstate Manufacturing company. That was in a corner of the main office, where David Harris sat poring over an account book. Once in a while he lifted his eyes and stared dreamily at the wall. It was not from weariness or distaste for the extra work he was doing. It was when the picture of his fiance, pretty Mary Lee, came floating into his mind, and the air castles concerning her formed a perfect vista of magical creations.

As to the extra work, David welcomed that heartily. It meant extra money, and ready cash was a large element in his prospects just now. The company employing him did not pay princely salaries. Practical, hard-fisted old Silas Lee, Mary's father, had set the figure David must earn before he would consent to a marriage with his daughter. What worried David was that an advance in salary seemed a long ways off. Worse than that, he believed old Lee capable of encouraging the advances of suitors more desirable in a money way.

"Mary loves me, that's sure," soliloquized John, "so I can only keep plugging away. Perhaps a new opening may come along. Anyhow, I'll go at the work with the best that's in me. Hello!"

David was suddenly startled. The office door went open with a crash, and Mr. Morse, president of the company, plunged into view. He held an open telegram in his hand, and he looked anxious and flustered.

"Nobody here but you," he spoke in a disappointed tone, David fancied.

No, sir, I had some extra work—"

"Yes, yes— I know all about that: but where is Simmons, the head salesman?" asked the manufacturer.

"He started on his vacation this afternoon."

Mr. Morse sank into a chair, mopping his brow and acting pretty well disgusted. Then he fell to looking David over.

He Chuckled When David Explained Why He Was an Early Caller.

"See here," he said finally, "did you ever sell our goods?"

"Except to calling customers and through correspondence, no sir," admitted David, rather reluctantly.

"Do you think you could?"

"I'd try mighty hard, given a chance," replied David, wondering if the "new opening" was coming his way.

"Very well, I'm going to test you out," declared Mr. Morse with sudden determination. "Now, listen carefully. You know Borden, our traveling salesman? From the office we worked up a ten thousand dollar order for four machines from a Mr. William Henry of Acton. There were other bids, but our goods seemed to please Henry."

"I remember the case," said David.

"Three days ago Borden started for Acton. The next day we forwarded to his address at the American hotel there the specifications and contracts. Today we learned that he had gone off on one of his irregular bouts. I have just received a telegram from the American hotel, stating that he has not shown up there. You know Borden throws everything to the winds when his drinking fit takes him. I believe that some business rivals are in a plot to sidetrack him, and probably have his shut up somewhere, dazed or drugged."

"Now for the remedy," said Mr. Morse sharply. "The contract is to be let tomorrow morning at ten o'clock. If you think yourself strong enough to undertake the job—start out. If you succeed it will mean a good deal for you, I can tell you that. A train leaves in half an hour."

"I shall be a passenger on that train," said David simply, and put on his coat.

At five o'clock the next morning David was camping on the front porch of the home of Mr. William Henry. He had reached Acton at midnight, had got the forwarded specifications and contract at the hotel, and had learned that Mr. Henry lived at a suburb ten miles out of the city. He had hired a taxicab, had arrived, and now—David was waiting for daylight and for his prospective customer to wake up.

He sat on the top step of the porch rather drowsily, but figuring out what he would say to Henry, and thinking of Mary. He had been there an hour. Suddenly the front door was pushed open. Quite as suddenly a man came out. He carried a bundle done up in a sheet so big that he could not see over it, ran against David, and before the latter could get out of the way, both tumbled head over heels to the bottom of the steps.

The bundle burst open. With a clatter, silverware, jewelry and clothing spread all over the steps. David grabbed at the man. The latter nearly stunned him by kicking out, made a dive for some near shrubbery, and disappeared.

"What's all that racket?" demanded a stentorian voice, and a man in pajamas appeared at an upper balcony out of a room opening upon it.

"Burglary, I guess," replied David.

"I'll be down in a minute," shouted the man aloft. "The mischief!" he added as he reappeared below.

"The thief got away," explained David. "You see, he stumbled over me."

"Yes, but how came you to be on my porch at this unearthly hour of the morning?" inquired the disturbed house owner suspiciously.

"That will be easy to explain," assured David with a smile. "I am not a trespasser with evil designs."

"I should say not!" exclaimed Mr. William Henry. "You've saved me a heap. Hello, all the silver! My watch and chain! My fur winter overcoat! Why, the robber must have been ransacking the house for hours."

Mr. Henry went inside the hallway and sounded a gong. Two servants appeared. He directed the wonder-stricken pair to gather up the scattered plunder.

"You come in," he directed David. "Just wait till I get dressed. You must have something of a story to tell."

David was soon rejoined by his host in the library, into which he had been ushered.

"Now, then," spoke Mr. Henry, "let's hear all about it."

He looked pretty serious as David described the sudden appearance and wild flight of the burglar. Then his fat, jolly face creased into smiles, and he chuckled when David explained why he was an early caller.

"See here," said Mr. Henry, "you'll stay to breakfast with me. Then I've got something to say to you."

If David had been drowsy from his long vigil, the encounter with the burglar had roused him up pretty thoroughly. The ample meal to which he was invited by a most agreeable host encouraged him in the belief that Mr. Henry fully appreciated his accidental helpfulness in his behalf.

"Well," spoke Mr. Henry, when the repast was concluded, "let us get down to business."

"Yes, sir," said David expectantly.

"You produce that contract, and we'll just sign up. If you don't deserve that and better for what you've saved me, I'm mistaken. I'd do it, anyway, for I think your business rivals have played a trick on you."

David Harris went proudly back to his employer with his big ten thousand dollar order. A raise in salary and position came within a week, a happy marriage within a month, and one of the pleasantest surprises of the event was a wedding present from Mr. William Henry of Acton of the best piano money could buy.

ACCOUNTING FOR GRAY HAIRS

It is this kind of a wife that makes some men old and gray before their time.

"William," she says, after William is curled snugly up under the blankets for the night, "did you lock the front door?"

"Yes," says William briefly.

"You're sure you did?"

"Yes, sure."

"And you slipped the bolt, too?"

"Yes."

"You know you forgot it once, and it gave me such a turn when I found it out in the morning, I didn't get over it for a week. We haven't much that anybody'd want to steal, I know; but I don't want the little we have taken, for I—"

"I tell you I attended to the doors."

"Well, I hope so, for goodness sake. You attended to the basement door?"

"Yes, I tell you."

"Because if you hadn't, you or I, one or the other, would have to get up and attend to it now. I read today of—"

"Don't care what you read!"

"It said that a man forgot to—"

"I don't care if he did!"

"And in the night a burglar walked right in and—"

"I don't believe it."

"I've a good mind to get up and see if you have locked that door. You're sure?"

"How many times have I got to tell you what I did?"

"Well, you thought you locked it that time you left it unlocked."

Driven to desperation, the poor man crawls out of the warm bed and makes his way down the stairs to see if he locked the basement door, and when he comes back the wife opens her eyes long enough to say:

"Are you sure that it was not locked when you went down?"—Pittsburg Leader.

"He has a very magnetic personality."

"He has, indeed. Why that man keeps his friends even after they get automobiles."

POULTRY

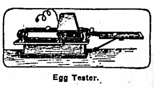
DAYLIGHT TESTER FOR EGGS

Michigan Man Has Invention That Will Prove Innovation in Poultry and Produce Business.

An electric daylight egg tester has been invented by Mr. S. J. Fish of Jackson, Mich., which will be an innovation in the poultry and produce business, for it is far ahead of candling in a dark room, says the Popular Electricity.

Electric No. 2, as it is called, is about 3 feet in length and contains a belt, with small metal trays about 3 inches apart for holding the eggs, which is run over rollers at each end of the case by the aid of a crank. This machine is equipped with an electric lamp and a cord attachable to any electric light socket.

A hood with an opening is placed over the lamp and, as the egg passes over it, the light flashes on automatically, remaining only so long as the egg is under examination; a perfect one is a clear deep orange color, while a bad one is black; the eggs turn automatically on the belt, enabling the tester to examine from all sides. The good eggs are allowed to roll out on a canvas table, which is done without danger of breakage, while the operator discards the ones which are spoiled.



Egg Tester.

When the ordinary lighting current cannot be secured, the machine is equipped with 24 dry batteries in multiple series, which furnish current for low voltage electric lamps.

An expert and two helpers can test about 80 cases per day with absolutely no danger from fire. Eggs are tested in a daylight room, and with great rapidity.

PROPER FEEDS FOR POULTRY

Best Rule Is to Watch Fowls and Give Them What They Will Clean Up—Milk Is Excellent.

Generally speaking, the poultryman need not worry much about feeding formulae. If he will feed about one-third as much corn as all other grains and feed animal and vegetable feeds in connection he will get fairly satisfactory results. Those who are accustomed to compounding rations might remember that a ratio of about 1.5 is considered a good ration for laying hens and 1.6 a good one for fattening poultry of all kinds.

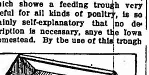
Fowls require the equivalent of about 27 pounds of dry feed for each 500 pounds of live weight. That is, 100 hens weighing 5 pounds each would require about 27 pounds of dry matter each day. If they are given milk, green, or other wet or juicy feeds, they will require less grain. About 4 ounces of dry matter per day is the quantity required for best results.

The very best rule is to watch the fowls and feed them about all they will eat. It is not a good plan to allow feed to lie uneaten. There is no danger of the hens becoming too fat as long as they are kept busy scratching for their feed. It is the fat hen that lays the eggs regularly.

GOOD POULTRY FEED TROUGH

Useful for All Kinds of Poultry and So Self-Explanatory That No Description Is Necessary.

The accompanying illustration, which shows a feeding trough very useful for all kinds of poultry, is so plainly self-explanatory that no description is necessary, says the Iowa Homestead. By the use of this trough no food can be wasted nor can the fowls get into the trough with their feet and thus soil it or impair the feeding value of the food.



Poultry Feed Trough.

Green Food for Winter.

Sprouted oats, cabbage and brittle, well-kept turnips furnish the best green poultry food for winter. Alfalfa or clover leaves or sweepings from the big barn floor, if scalded up and fed clean or with a little ground feed, will largely take the place of green food and in a way is better than all other green stuff without it.

Cleaning Poultry House.

In cleaning out an old hen house nothing is better than to wash down the walls with strong carbolic acid water, using an old broom. Then whitewash.

MADE A CLEAN JOB OF IT

A jolly old boy, from the Midlands entered into one of the hotels at the seaside, and, seeing on the slab on the right a crab dressed on the shell with legs, claws and parsley ranged round, said to the landlord:

"What d'ye call that?"

"Crab," was the answer.

"Looks good. I'll have 'un; and gie us a pint o' ale."

Bread and butter was added and the diner left to his dinner. In about an hour the genial landlord entered the dining-room to see if his guest was getting on all right. He found him chawing up the last claw, the chawer red in the face but beaming.

"Like the crab, sir?"

"Yes; he was capital. I never tasted one afore. But I think you baked 'un a little too long; the crust was hard. Let's have another pint."

He had eaten the lot—shell, claws and all complete.—London Tit-Bits.

RASH SPREAD TO ARMS

759 Roach Ave., Indianapolis, Ind.—"At first I noticed small eruptions on my face. The trouble began as a rash. It looked like red pimples. In a few days they spread to my arms and back. They itched and burned so badly that I scratched them and of course the result was blood and matter. The eruptions festered, broke, opened and dried up, leaving the skin dry and scaly. I spent many sleepless nights, my back, arms and face burning and itching; sleep was purely and simply out of the question. The trouble also caused disfigurement. My clothing irritated the breaking out.

"By this time I had used several well-known remedies without success. The trouble continued. Then I began to use the sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment. Within seven or eight days I noticed gratifying results. I purchased a full-sized cake of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment and in about eighteen or twenty days my cure was complete." Stretching It Some.

Two men were boasting about their rich kin. Said one: "My father has a big farm in Connecticut. It is so big that when he goes to the barn on Monday morning to milk the cows he kisses us all goodby, and he doesn't get back till the following Saturday."

"Why does it take him so long?" the other asked.

"Because the barn is so far away from the house."

"Well, that may be a pretty big farm, but compared to my father's farm in Pennsylvania your father's farm ain't no bigger than a city lot!"

"Why, how big is your father's farm?"

"Well, it's so big that my father sends young married couples out to the barn to milk the cows, and the milk is brought back by their grandchildren."

A Tender Point.

"What got you into trouble with this policeman?" demanded the New York judge.

"Just trying to ask him a civil question, your honor," said the visitor, "nothing more."

"What was the question?"

"I just asked him when the next official murder would be dragged off."

ROYALTY WELCOMES THE AMERICAN SETTLER

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS, THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT, WELCOMES AMERICANS TO CANADA.

It was a happy speech, that on that beautiful October day, the Duke of Connaught, Governor-General of Canada, made at Macleod, Alberta. It was an opportune speech, heartful and resonant with good fellowship. And, as it was specially intended for American ears, the audience, comprised largely of so many American settlers in Canada, the time and place could not have been better chosen.

It was in reply to an address of welcome tendered to him at the pretty city of Macleod, with the foothills of the Rockies as a setting, and the great wheat fields between, and in fact all around the place as the foreground, that His Highness, true to the best interests of the country and to those of the Americans who choose to make Canada their home, said in part:

"I am well aware that among those whom I am now addressing, there are a very great proportion who were not born under the British flag. Most of these will have realized by now that residence under that flag implies no disabilities. All we ask is that the laws of Canada should be obeyed.

"With this provision every one is free to come and go, to marry, to live and to die as seems best to him, and as it pleases Providence.

"We bring no pressure to bear on anyone to adopt the Canadian nationality, for we do not value citizenship which is obtained under compulsion.

"Our American cousins are welcome from over the border. Thrice we welcome our Canadian and British brothers, who return to the Union Jack, after living under the Stars and Stripes.

"History is repeating itself. For many years hundreds of young Britishers have sought fortune in the western States. Time has brought about a change, and the tide has set in the other direction, bringing across the frontier numbers of our neighbors to whom we are glad to return hospitalities.

"One of the chief dispensers of such hospitality in proportion to its population has, as we have said, changed its character from an important cattle town to a thriving wheat producing area.

"What it has lost from the picturesque point of view, it has gained in the material side, and I wish, in conclusion, to express the hope that the prosperity which has evinced itself here for the past ten years, may continue unabated in the future."

There is no reason why at a hundred places on this educative, instructive and interesting trip of His Royal Highness he might not have expressed himself in the same terms, and on each occasion, addressed large gatherings of Americans who are now settled on the prairies of Western Canada.—Advertisement.

Calumet Ends "Bad Luck."

Remember when you were a youngster, what a trial baking day was? If Mother was lucky, everything went finely—but if she had "bad luck" her cakes and her pies and her bread were failures. Her success in baking seemed to depend almost altogether on "luck."

Nowadays there's no such thing as "baking luck." At least, not in the kitchens of the up-to-date cooks. Simply because Calumet Baking Powder has smashed that old time idea. It has made baking sure of success. It has made inexperienced cooks able to bake perfectly, and day after day it is saving hundreds of dollars' worth of time and materials by doing away with costly failures.

Calumet Baking Powder is the purest baking powder made—and guaranteed not only to BE pure, but to stay pure in the CAN and in the BAKING. Calumet has twice been officially judged the BEST baking powder made—receiving the highest awards at the World's Pure Food Expositions in Chicago (1907) and in Paris (1912). Adv.

SERIAL STORY

EXCUSE ME!

By Rupert Hughes

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Annie Gattle, a fellow passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers. Mrs. Wellington hears Little Jimmie's voice. Later she meets Mrs. Whitcomb. Mallory reports to Marjorie his failure to find a preacher. They decide to pretend a quarrel and Mallory finds a vacant berth. Mrs. Jimmie discovers Wellington on the train. Mallory again makes an unsuccessful hunt for a preacher. Dr. Temple poses as a physician. Mrs. Temple is induced by Mrs. Wellington to smoke a cigar. Sight of preacher on a station platform raises Mallory's hopes, but he takes another train. Missing hand baggage compels the couple to borrow from passengers. Jimmie gets a cinder in his eye and Mrs. Jimmie gives first aid. Coolness is then resumed. Still no clergyman. More borrowing. Dr. Temple puzzled by behavior of different couples. Marjorie's jealousy aroused by Mallory's baseball jargon. Marjorie suggests wrecking the train in hopes that accident will produce a preacher. Also tries to induce the conductor to hold the train so she can shop. Marjorie's dog is missing. She pulls the cord, stopping the train. Conductor restores dog and lovers quarrel. Lathrop wires for a preacher to marry him and Miss Gattle. Mallory tells Lathrop of his predicament and arranges to borrow the preacher. Kitty Lewellyn, former sweetheart of Mallory's, appears and arouses Marjorie's jealousy. Preacher boards train. After marrying Lathrop and Miss Gattle the preacher escapes Mallory by leaping from moving train. Mallory's dejection moves Marjorie to reconciliation.

About the same time, the man who was still her husband according to the law, rolled out of berth number two. There was an amazing clarity to his vision. He lurched as he made his way to the men's room, but it was plainly the train's swerve and not an inner lurch that twisted the forthright of his progress.

He squeezed into the men's room like a whole crowd at once, and sang out, "Good morning, all!" with a wonderful heartiness. Then he paused over a wash basin, rubbed his hands gleefully and proclaimed, like another Chanticler advertising a new day:

"Well—I'm sober again!"

"Three cheers for you," said his rival in radiance, bridegroom Lathrop.

"How does it feel?" demanded Ashton, smiling so broadly that he encountered the lather on his brush.

"I feel," he chortled, "I feel like the first little robin redbreast of the marry springtime. Tweet! Tweet!"

"Well, I see they had another scrap last night."

"They—who?" said Ira, through his flying toothbrush.

"The Mallorys. Once more he occupied number three and she number seven."

"Well, well, I can't understand these modern marriages," said Little Jimmie, with a side glance at Ira. Ira suddenly remembered the plight of the Mallorys and was tempted to defend them, but he saw the young lieutenant himself just entering the washroom. This was more than Wellington saw, for he went on talking from behind a towel:

"Well, if I were a bridegroom and had a bride like that, it would take more than a quarrel to send me to another berth."

The others made gestures which he could not see. His enlightenment came when Mallory snapped the towel from his hands and glared into his face with all the righteous wrath of a man hearing his domestic affairs publicly discussed.

"Were you alluding to me, Mr. Wellington?" he demanded, hotly.

Little Jimmie almost perished with apoplexy: "You, you?" he mumbled. "Why, of course not. You're not the only bridegroom on the train."

Mallory tossed him the towel again: "You meant Mr. Lathrop then?"

"Me! Not much!" roared the indignant Lathrop.

Mallory returned to Wellington with a fiercer: "Whom, then?"

He was in a dangerous mood, and Ashton came to the rescue: "Oh, don't mind Wellington. He's not sober yet."

This inspired suggestion came like a life-buoy to the hard-pressed Wellington. He seized it and spoke thickly: "Don't mind me—I'm not sober yet."

"Well, it's a good thing you're not," was Mallory's final growl as he began his own toilet.

The porter's bell began to ring furiously, with a touch they had already come to recognize as the Englishman's. The porter had learned to recognize it, too, and he always took double the necessary time to answer it. He was sauntering down the aisle at his most leisurely gait when Wedgewood's rumpled mane shot out from the curtains like a lion's from a jungle, and he bellowed: "Pawtah! Pawtah!"

"Still on the train," said the porter.

"You may give me my portmanteau."

"Yassah." He dragged it from the upper berth, and set it inside Wedgewood's berth without special care as to its destination. "Does you desire anything else, sir?"

"Yes, your absence," said Wedgewood.

"The same to you and many of them," the porter muttered to himself, and added to Marjorie, who was just starting down the aisle: "I'll suttainly be interested in that man gittin' where he's goin' to git to." Noting that she carried Snoozleums, he said: "We're comin' into a station right soon." Without further discussion she handed him the dog, and he bobbed away.

When she reached the women's door, she found Mrs. Wellington waiting with increasing exasperation: "Come, join the line at the box office," she said.

"Good morning. Who's in there?" said Marjorie, and Mrs. Wellington, not noting that Mrs. Whitcomb had come out of her berth and fallen into line, answered sharply:

"I don't know. She's been there forever. I'm sure it's that cat of a Mrs. Whitcomb."

"Good morning, Mrs. Mallory," snapped Mrs. Whitcomb.

Mrs. Wellington was rather proud that the random shot landed, but Marjorie felt most uneasy between the two tigresses: "Good morning, Mrs. Whitcomb," she said. There was a disagreeable silence, broken finally by Mrs. Wellington's: "Oh, Mrs. Mallory, would you be angelic enough to hook my gown?"

"Of course I will," said Marjorie.

"May I hook you?" said Mrs. Whitcomb.

"You're awfully kind," said Marjorie, presenting her shoulders to Mrs. Whitcomb, who asked with malicious sweetness: "Why didn't your husband do this for you this morning?"

"I—I don't remember," Marjorie stammered, and Mrs. Wellington tossed over-shoulder an apothegm: "He's no husband till he's hook-broken."

Just then Mrs. Fosdick came out of her stateroom. Seeing Mrs. Whitcomb's waist agape, she went at it with a brief, "Good morning, everybody. Permit me."

Mrs. Wellington twisted her head to say "Good morning" and to ask, "Are you hooked, Mrs. Fosdick?"

"Not yet," pouted Mrs. Fosdick.

"Turn round and back up," said Mrs. Wellington. After some maneuvering, the women formed a complete circle, and fingers plied hooks and eyes in a veritable Ladies' Mutual Aid Society.

By now, Wedgewood was ready to appear in a bathrobe about as gaudy as the royal standard of Great Britain. He stalked down the aisle, and answered the male chorus's cheery "Good morning" with a ramlike "Baw."

Ira Lathrop felt amiable even toward the foreigner, and he observed: "Glorious morning this morning."

"I dare say," growled Wedgewood. "I don't go in much for mawnings—especially when I have no tub."

Wellington felt called upon to squelch him: "You Englishmen never had a real tub till we Americans sold 'em to you."

"I dare say," said Wedgewood indifferently. "You sell 'em. We use 'em. But, do you know, I've just thought out a ripping idea. I shall have my cold bath this mawning after all."

"What are you going to do?" growled Lathrop. "Crawl in the ice-water tank?"

"Oh, dear, no. I shouldn't be let," and he produced from his pocket a rubber hose. "I simply affix this little tube to one end of the spigot and wave the sprinklah byah ovah my—er—my person."

Lathrop stared at him pityingly, and demanded: "What happens to the water, then?"

"What do I care?" said Wedgewood.

"You durned fool, you'd flood the car."

Wedgewood's high hopes withered. "I hadn't thought of that," he sighed. "I suppose I must continue just as I am till I reach San Francisco. The first thing I shall order tonight will be four cold tubs and a lemon squash."

While the men continued to make themselves presentable in a huddle, the hook-and-eye society at the other end of the car finished with the four waists, and Mrs. Fosdick hurried away to keep her tryst in the dining-car. The three remaining relapsed into dreary attitudes. Mrs. Wellington shook the knob of the forbidding door, and turned to complain: "What in heaven's name ails the creature in there. She must have fallen out of the window."

"It's outrageous," said Marjorie, "the way women violate women's rights."

Mrs. Whitcomb saw an opportunity to insert a stiletto. She observed to Marjorie, with an innocent air: "Why, Mrs. Mallory, I've even known women to lock themselves in there and smoke!"

While Mrs. Wellington was rummaging her brain for a fitting retort, the door opened, and out stepped Miss Gattle, as was.

She blushed furiously at sight of the committee waiting to greet her, but they repented their criticisms and tried to make up for them by the excessive warmth with which they all exclaimed at once: "Good morning, Mrs. Lathrop!"

"Good morning, who?" said Anne, then blushed yet redder: "Oh, I can't seem to get used to that name! I hope I haven't kept you waiting?"

"Oh, not at all!" the women insisted, and Anne fled to number six, remembered that this was no longer her home, and moved on to number one. Here the porter was just finishing his restoring tasks, and laying aside with some diffidence two garments which Anne hastily stuffed into her own valise.

Meanwhile Marjorie was pushing Mrs. Wellington ahead:

"You go in first, Mrs. Wellington."

"You go first. I have no husband waiting for me," said Mrs. Wellington.

"Oh, I insist," said Marjorie.

"I couldn't think of it," persisted Mrs. Wellington. "I won't allow you."

And then Mrs. Whitcomb pushed them both aside: "Pardon me, won't you? I'm getting off at Reno."

"So am I," gasped Mrs. Wellington, rushing forward, only to be faced by the slam of the door and the click of the key. She whirled back to demand of Marjorie: "Did you ever hear of such impudence?"

"I never did."

"I'll never be ready for Reno," Mrs. Wellington wailed, "and I haven't had my breakfast."

"You'd better order it in advance," said Marjorie. "It takes that chef an hour to boil an egg three minutes."

"I will, if I can ever get my face washed," sighed Mrs. Wellington.

And now Mrs. Anne Lathrop, after much hesitation, called timidly, "Porter—porter—please!"

"Yes—miss—missus!" he amended.

"Will you call my—" she gulped—"my husband?"

"Yes, ma'am," the porter chuckled, and putting his grinning head in at the men's door, he bowed to Ira and said: "Excuse me, but you are sent for by the lady in number one."

Ashton slapped him on the back and roared: "Oh, you married man!"

"Well," said Ira, in self-defense, "I don't hear anybody sending for you." Wedgewood grinned at Ashton. "I rather fancy he had you theah, old top, eh, what?"

Ira appeared at number one, and bending over his treasure-trove, spoke in a voice that was pure saccharine: "Are you ready for breakfast, dear?"

"Yes, Ira."

"Come along to the dining-car."

"It's cosier here," she said. "Couldn't we have it served here?"

"But it'll get all cold, and I'm hungry," pouted the old bachelor, to whom breakfast was a sacred institution.

"All right, Ira," said Anne, glad to be meek; "come along," and she rose.

Ira hesitated. "Still, if you'd rather, we'll eat here." He sat down.

"Oh, not at all," said Anne; "we'll go where you want to go."

"But I want to do what you want to do."

"So do I—we'll go," said Anne.

"We'll stay."

"No, I insist on the dining-car."

"Oh, all right, have your own way," said Ira, as if he were being bullied, and liked it. Anne smiled at the contrariness of men, and Ira smiled at the contrariness of women, and when they reached the vestibule they kissed each other in mutual forgiveness.

As Wedgewood stropped an old-fashioned razor, he said to Ashton, who was putting up his safety equipment: "I say, old party, are those safety razors safe? Can't you really cut yourself?"

"Cut everything but hair," said Ashton, pointing to his wounded chin.

Inn of the Mild Henry.

The inn "of the mild Henry (zum sanften Heinrich) in a little town of Posen has evidently changed hands during its career, for there is at least an intimation, in an advertisement recently inserted in a Posen newspaper by Hermann Dunkelberg, the present owner, that he may not be especially mild. The advertisement reads: "It has come to my notice that I am accused of having denounced colleagues because they suffered Tannebaum" (a forbidden game) "to be played in their places. As I have no desire to waste my time in court, I hereby promise three marks to anybody who believed this report out of lack of brains, five marks to anybody who spread it because of malice and ten marks to the originator of it, which he can get on personal application to me. Will pay fair price for a good, usable bullwhip. Herman Dunkelbarg, Inn of the Mild Henry."

Hoe Came First.

The hoe seems to have been the first aid to the husbandman's labors after the hands and sharpened sticks became insufficient; and in Egypt was made of wood, as elsewhere shown. The plow was preceded by a larger hoe, dragged and operated by two or more men or women. The plow in many countries (a sharpened beam), was at an early date shod and strengthened by strips of iron, the share only being of steel or iron. Single and double wheels are by no means modern additions to this ancient and characteristic labor-saving implement.—"The Farmer in Ancient Times," Charles Winslow Hall, in National Magazine.

FINAL RESULT OF IMPURE BLOOD

If you need strength, if your blood is thin, your digestion disordered, it will pay you to investigate the merits of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, the remedy that has transformed so many weak, anæmic, dyspeptic, ambitionless people into strong, healthy, hungry men and women.

Mrs. Lena May Roberts, whose address is R. F. D. No. 3, Aberdeen, So. Dakota after several months of suffering finally found the right tonic in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. She says:

"For months after the birth of my baby, I suffered terribly from a general breakdown in health. I was in bed for three months and after that was able to be up only part of the time. I was sick all over, being pale, weak and thin. My appetite was gone and my head ached most of the time. Oftentimes there seemed to be a rush of blood to my head and I would faint away. I was very nervous and was not strong enough to do any work.

"As the treatment I was taking did not help me, I began to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, which a friend said had helped her. After taking a few boxes, I began to get well rapidly. I continued using them for a time and am now as well and strong as ever in my life."

The value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills in general debility lies in their direct response to the needs of the blood. Their work is to make new blood. That they do this well is shown by the gradual disappearance of the symptoms and the return of color and health. They lay the foundation for permanent health in the future.

For the same reason these pills have cured anæmia, after-effects of the grip and fevers, rheumatism, indigestion, and nervousness, dizziness, neuralgia and St. Vitus' dance, and are recommended wherever a tonic for the blood and nerves is needed.

A valuable booklet, "Diseases of the Blood," containing fuller information about rheumatism and other diseases of the blood will be sent free upon request.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y. Adv.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

FIGHTING THE GHOSTS

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

I HAD DINED AT the house of Madame A——, the widow of an old friends, and was about to leave, when she whispered:

"Don't go. I want to speak to you. Have you seen my brother Xavier of late?"

"No. Why?"

"Then you know nothing of his impending marriage?"

"Not a word. Who is the fortunate lady?"

"Don't joke; the matter is serious. I want your advice, and, Heaven knows, probably your help. Something strange has happened to him. Within the last fortnight I had noticed his haggard looks; and, after questioning him several times, he informed me that he intended to marry Mademoiselle Germaine E——, a girl barely eighteen; and he, as you know, is forty-three. He refused to enter into any explanations, and cut my questions short with the remark that he was compelled to marry her. When, a few days later, I once more referred to the subject, he went away, and I have not seen him since."

"I am sorry for you," I retorted, "but Xavier is not the first man who makes a fool of himself in that way. He is very much of age, and probably very much in love. I therefore do not see where I can be of any use to you or to him."

"I tell you there is a mystery about this that scares me. Xavier's eyes looked haunted; I never saw such an expression on any one's face. For our old friendship's sake, find out what is at the bottom of it all."

"My dear friend," I retorted, "there is nothing in what you tell me to show that your fears are justified; but, since you appeal to our old friendship, I will see Xavier on the matter."

I had known Xavier for some years. He was a good-natured, easy-going, immensely rich fellow, who had idled through life; he was interested in horses, but was too lazy and indolent to have a racing stable.

I was not long gathering a few interesting facts. For the last six months, Xavier had ceased to frequent his favorite club, and he, a great whist-player, had deserted the card-table. But a more alarming symptom was that he had taken up spiritualism.

My next step was to learn what I could about Germaine E——, the girl Xavier intended to marry; and this is what I heard:

She was born in Vermont, of French parents, who had died, leaving her in charge of a poor farmer's family. M. E——, her father's brother, a large iron manufacturer in Toulouse, being childless, wrote to these farmers to say that he and his wife would adopt the orphan; and the money for the journey from the United States having been sent, Germaine, then in her fourteenth year, arrived in France. The girl was woefully ignorant, and uncouth in her manner, but, being remarkably intelligent, soon became very accomplished.

Despite her brilliant qualities, her uncle and aunt regretted having adopted her. She showed herself self-willed and headstrong.

For three nights I read works on spiritualism, and when I had crammed into my head as much as it could conveniently hold on that subject, I went in search of Xavier.

At one time I could have found him any hour of the day; but with all his habits changed, it was no easy matter, and I dared not call at his house for fear of arousing his suspicion. I discovered that every Wednesday night he dined at a little restaurant near the Montparnasse Station. I went there early and took my seat in a quiet corner. It was a queer place, patronized by gentlemen of the spirit-rapping fraternity.

It was getting late, and I was beginning to fear I should miss Xavier, when he came in and sat down at a table near me. He gave a quick glance around the room, but did not recognize me. I noticed a great change in him. His careless expression had disappeared, and now and then he would draw his fingers through his hair, an action altogether new to me.

"Hello, old chap!" I called out to him.

He turned around and stared at me in surprise.

"Hallo, Goron, what brings you here?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, I am here on a rather queer errand. Come with me to the cafe at the corner, where we can talk. Perhaps you can give me some information."

A quarter of an hour later, when we were seated opposite each other, I began:

"What I am going to say to you must remain between ourselves. Is this understood?"

"Perfectly."

"The fact is, I'm in a bit of a fix. For the last three months I have been investigating a very difficult case, without being able to find the slightest clue. Yesterday I was on the point of giving it up in despair, when I remembered that one of my foreign colleagues had, through the help of a medium, obtained some valuable information that put him on the right trail. I decided to make a final attempt, and went to that little restaurant, where I hoped to meet a man who, I know, is well versed in these matters. My man did not turn up; but, fortunately, I saw you, and possibly you may assist me."

"Look here, Goron," he cried, with an excitement such as I should not have thought was in his nature, "I can, and will, help you. Strictly between ourselves, I have gone in for spiritualism. I have a splendid medium for you, a man called Boissier, who assists me in my researches. He is now, I dare say, waiting for me at restaurant. I will bring him here."

"Hold hard, Xavier!" I cried. "I shall be delighted to make the acquaintance of your friend Boissier. You must, however, remember that it will never do for me, the Chief of the Detective Police, to let a stranger know that I have recourse to the occult science to detect crime. The comic papers would make fine sport of me. Since you kindly offer to help me, only you and I must know of it. But, if you like, you can introduce me to M. Boissier under another name, always supposing he does not know me by sight."

"There is no fear of that," cried Xavier; "Boissier has been all his life abroad, and returned to France only some six months ago. I'll fetch him."

A moment later Xavier came back, accompanied by a clean-shaven man with a large face. My friend introduced me as M. Martin from Bordeaux, and I had the pleasure of shaking M. Boissier's fat, flabby hand.

I alleged an engagement, and soon took my leave, after having made an appointment with Xavier for the following day.

When we met, Xavier informed me that Boissier would put himself at my disposal if I wanted to hold any intercourse with the other world.

"Boissier," he added, "is a wonderful chap. I have the greatest confidence in him, and through him you will, I am sure, arrive at good results." Suddenly he turned to me with the question:

"Have you heard I am getting married?"

"No. I have no time to go into society. Let me congratulate you. Who is the lady?"

He remained silent a moment, ran his fingers through his hair, and remarked:

"Her name is Germaine E——. Since you are interested in spiritualism, I want you to make her acquaintance. You will find her an accomplished girl. She is young, very young—too young for me," he added in almost a whisper.

I eyed my friend narrowly, and dared not question him, for I felt I was nearing the secret. But he shook his head, and as we walked together in the direction of his house, we did not exchange a word. On reaching his door I wished him good-night, when he seized my arm and said:

"Come in; I want to talk to you."

We went into his smoking-room, and his valet had hardly closed the door, when he exclaimed:

"Goron, don't go in for spiritualism! The human mind cannot stand it. Mine is giving way under the strain."

And then I saw in his eyes the haunted look that had scared his sister.

I put my hand on his shoulder, and said soothingly:

"I see you are fearfully worried. You know you can trust me."

With his eyes half shut, as if in a trance, he spoke so rapidly that I had some trouble to follow him.

"Goron, the future has been revealed to me. I have heard voices, and they told me what would happen. I will perform great deeds, with the help of a woman, my wife, and her name is Germaine E——. Evil influences are at work against me; but I will escape them, thanks to that woman. She, too, has heard the same voices, and must obey their injunctions."

"Were it not for these mysterious commands, I would never marry that girl—in every way unsuited to me. But it is in the decree of fate. Next week our banns will be published."

I had come prepared for something of that sort; but this was much more serious than I had expected, and I began to wonder how much villany I should detect before I came to the bottom of the affair.

To reason with a man apparently under a kind of spell would have been folly. I therefore refrained from comment, and said:

"I know of cases where persons, having misunderstood the words of the spirits, have tested the accuracy of their commands by other means. Suppose we, too, make another test?"

Xavier, who had been nervously pacing up and down the room, stopped in front of me.

"No," he cried; "I have applied a test, and one that will put even your doubts at rest. On the advice of a friend, I went to a famous fortune-teller, and the first thing I heard from her was that I would marry Germaine. Don't smile, Goron. Like you I have always been skeptical of palmists and their kind. But I heard of another well-known soothsayer in Lyons, and when I called on her she told me the identical thing. I even went to Amsterdam, to a woman whose address had been given me, and the result was the same. Can you wonder when I say that influences are at work?"

"Yes, Xavier," I cried; "you are right. Influences are at work; but you and I will prove stronger than they!"

Poor Xavier, who, of course, did not understand the inner meaning of my words, gazed at me in astonishment, and said:

"I want you to meet Germaine. Will you dine with us tomorrow night at Voisin's, at eight o'clock?"

"With pleasure. But remember that as I , too, want to consult the spirits, I must, for the next few days, remain M. Martin, for your fiancee as well as for your friend Boissier."

"Very well. I promise not to make a mistake." In a bitter tone, he added, "My fiancee, as you will see, is emancipated, and does not object to dining with me in a restaurant without a chaperon."

As I alighted at Voisin's a brougham drove up with Xavier, Boissier, and Mlle. Germaine, the latter a slim, pale girl, with a curious way of looking at people from the corners of her gray eyes.

She spoke very little, nor was Xavier in a mood to talk. Boissier, on the other hand, was in great form, and talked to everybody, including the waiters. He seemed to have taken a great liking to me, and, clapping me on the back, said:

"Martin, I shall be delighted to assist you, if you want any advice from the other world."

"I HAVE DECEIVED YOU! FORGIVE ME!"

"That is awfully good of you," I replied; "the sooner the better, as I want to get back to Bordeaux."

We arranged to meet the following afternoon at his apartment in the Rue Bleue; and, at his request, Germaine promised to come, too.

"She is wonderful!" remarked Boissier; "she seems to command the spirits!"

Xavier and I saw Germaine home, and we walked a little way together.

"How long have you known Boissier?" I asked.

"About six months."

"Was it through him you made Mlle. Germaine's acquaintance?"

"Yes. I saw her the first time at the seance of the S. S. Society, where Boissier had taken me."

"Do you mind giving me the name of the fortune-teller you consulted here in Paris?"

Xavier hesitated a moment.

"Mademoiselle Clementine is her name."

"The woman in the Avenue Trudaine?"

"Yes. Do you know her?"

"No; I know of her." And with that I wished him good-night.

When I called at the Rue Bleue, Germaine was sitting in a listless attitude on the sofa. Boissier was as boisterous as ever.

"Come on, Pythonissa," he shouted to the girl; "mount your tripos; our friend Martin is in a hurry."

Germaine sat down at the table, placed a piece of paper in front of her, took up a pencil, and looked at me from the corners of her eyes, while Boissier held his hands over her head. Having remained a minute in that position, he beckoned to me to come close up to him, and whispered:

"Put your question!"

"I should like to know," I said, "where Maillard, who died a year ago, hid the documents for which his relatives are searching."

Germaine, her eyes half-closed, began to write slowly, and I read: "In a black bag."

"Where is the bag?" I asked.

Again the pencil moved, and wrote: "In the garden."

"Go on with your questions," said Boissier.

"No, thank you," I retorted; "you have given me most valuable information; I can act upon that."

The banns of Xavier's marriage were to be published on the 13th; it was already the 6th, and I shuddered when I thought how little time was left to me to sift this business.

I went home and traced my plan. The investigations I had to make would take me away from Paris fully three days; and there remained, therefore, only another three days to put into execution the scheme which I trusted would bring everything to light.

During my absence, I had Boissier and Germaine watched. On my return I learned that the latter had met Xavier twice, but otherwise had not called anywhere nor received visitors, with the exception of Boissier, who had gone to her house and stayed there half an hour.

Boissier, on the other hand, had been very busy. He had met Xavier every day; he had spent an evening at Mlle. Clementine's private residence at Suresnes. He had also been seen in earnest conversation with two ladies, who proved to be connected with Clementine's establishment. Moreover, he had dined with an individual called Riviere, who occupied a bedroom above Boissier's apartment. This Riviere had once been arrested on a charge of embezzlement, but had been discharged.

My scheme was not only a risky one, but needed elaborate preparation. I started early by calling on a bachelor friend, and obtained his permission to use his apartment in the Place Valois for the following afternoon. At my request, he also instructed his housekeeper, an elderly woman, to place herself at my disposal. From there I went to Xavier.

"Keep yourself free tomorrow," I said; "I will call for you at two o'clock."

"What for?" he asked.

"I will tell you that later. I do not intend to waste your valuable time; nor can I afford to lose mine. I suppose you can trust me?"

"All right," he sighed, "I'll wait for you."

I then drove to the Rue Bleue, and caught Boissier just as he was leaving the house. When he saw me he held out both hands.

"What cheer, Martin?"

"I am glad I caught you. Professor Leroy, the well-known spiritualist from Brussels, is here. He has invited me to a private seance, and allows me to bring a few friends. Xavier is coming, and I want you to give us the pleasure of your company."

"Leroy, Leroy," he replied; "I never heard that name. But if Xavier comes I will join your party."

"I am sure you will enjoy it. Here is the address. Three o'clock, sharp."

At the Avenue Kleber, Mlle. Germaine told me she had a had cold, but would wrap up well and assist at the seance.

As I left her house, I heard my name called, and a carriage stopped a few yards from me. I recognized Mme. A——, Xavier's sister.

"My dear Goron," she cried, in an anxious tone, "how is it I have not heard from you? Have you forgotten your promise?"

"I have forgotten nothing. In order to help your brother I have even embarked on a strange adventure. Hitherto I have had to do with living men; now I am fighting ghosts."

The next day I found Xavier more peevish than usual. I pretended not to notice this, and when his brougham drove us to the Place Valois, I said:

"Xavier, I have invited you to an odd performance. Promise me to keep your nerves under control, and not to utter a word during the seance until I give you leave. On my part, I promise you that, in all probability, you will sleep better tonight than you have for the last three months. Is it understood?"

He nodded assent, and I knew I could trust him.

When we reached the Place Valois, Professor Leroy was arranging the dining-room where the seance was to be held.

We waited in the drawing-room for Germaine and Boissier, who arrived within five minutes of each other; we then followed the professor to the dining-room. The blinds had been room.

Leroy bade Xavier and Germaine sit down in one corner of the room, and Boissier and me in the opposite one.

"You will," he began, "witness some extraordinary manifestations. Some of the phenomena may even be of a startling nature, for I am the first man who has succeeded in making persons communicate direct with departed spirits without passing through the hands of a medium. The experiment is a difficult one, and its success depends on the relations that have existed between the questioner and the spirit evoked."

Addressing me, he continued:

"Monsieur, I shall begin with you. Please think of a departed person with whom you wish to speak."

"I have thought of one," I replied.

The professor laid one hand on my right shoulder, and, raising the other in the air, uttered a few words in a weird-sounding tongue. We waited a minute, but no response came.

The same experiment was tried with Xavier and Boissier, but with no better results.

"I do not know how to account for this," said the professor, in a vexed tone. "I have never yet seen the spirits so hostile. I shall now ask mademoiselle to recall some one with whom she would like to converse."

"I have done so," said Germaine.

The professor then laid his hand on her shoulder; but the moment he lifted the other, a noise burst upon us as if all Bedlam had been let loose. It lasted only a few seconds, but it made our very bones leap.

"Good heavens! what was that?" asked Xavier.

"I don't know," said the professor; "this is quite new to me. We shall soon see."

He again touched Germaine, and once more the deafening din arose, worse than before.

Xavier and Germaine, looking very scared, rose from their seats, when the professor stopped them.

"Sit down," he shouted. "Hark, the spirits are there; I can hear them!"

After a silence that seemed oppressive, we heard a low moan in the distance, which grew louder as it came nearer. When it had reached our room, it stopped. There was another minute of suspense, and then a voice, very far off, called out: "Lily! Lily!"

Germaine started. She was deathly pale.

Again the voice was heard, but much nearer:

"Lily! Lily! Why have you done this?"

Germaine was shaking so I thought she would drop. Then she cried:

"Forgive me! Forgive me, Germaine! I promise to atone!"

Boissier jumped up to go toward her. I seized his wrist, and whispered in his ear:

"I am not Martin; my name is Goron. If you make a move or utter a sound, you are lost!"

The seance broke up in a state of excitement. Xavier conducted the half-fainting Germaine to the drawing-room.

I went to her and said:

"Mademoiselle, I suppose you would like to speak to us now?"

"Yes," she replied; "call your friend Xavier; but not Boissier."

She shuddered as she mentioned the name.

I returned to the dining-room.

"Professor," I said, "keep close to that fellow Boissier till I come back. If he tries any nonsense clap the handcuffs on him."

"I'll look after him, sir," laughed the professor.

Germaine was sitting in an easy-chair, with her eyes closed, the while Xavier walked about excitedly.

"What does it all—"

"Hush!" I interrupted him. "You will hear the truth now."

"I have deceived you! Forgive me!"

Beckoning Xavier to remain silent, I raised the girl from the floor, and said:

"Whom is he to forgive? Is it Germaine, or—"

"No," she shrieked in a paroxysm of grief. "Don't speak, I will tell everything!"

"My name is Lily Bradley, and I am the daughter of the farmers who took charge of Germaine when her parents died. My father and mother were very good to her; but Germaine was sickly, and the doctor said she could not live long. Then came the letter of M. E—— in Toulouse, proposing to adopt his niece; and my parents, being poor, decided to let me take her place. I begged them not to do this; but I was only thirteen, and they pressed me so hard that I consented. Two years later Germaine died, and—"

"Your parents committed a second fraud by burying her under your name," I said.

"How on earth, Goron, do you—"

"Keep quiet, Xavier. Please go on, Miss Lily."

"Some time after that my parents died, too, when one day I received a visit from that man, Boissier. My father knew him, and I remember his saying the fellow was a scoundrel. Somehow Boissier had got hold of the secret, and he threatened to denounce me unless I consented to assist him in a plot.

"He had become intimate with M. Xavier; and the plan was that I should marry M. Xavier, and afterward pay Boissier a large sum of money. 'He is rich,' he said, 'and I want some of his money.' If M. Xavier had not gone in for spiritualism, this conspiracy would never have been started. Several times I have felt tempted to write him an anonymous letter warning him against the plot; but Boissier terrorized me, and I dared not risk it. I have also—"

She stopped and an expression of intense pain came over her face.

I saw she was really ill; and as, for several reasons I did not want her to go back to where she was staying, I sent for a cab and asked the housekeeper to take my card, and convey the girl to a home managed by one of my friends, who would look after her.

Boissier was sitting motionless in the dining-room by the side of the "professor," who was reading a morning paper.

"Take him to the prefecture, Leroy," I said. "I will see him tonight or tomorrow morning."

"Yes, sir. Come along, my boy, you and I will look at a few more ghosts."

And he led away Boissier, who shivered with fright and had not the strength to utter a syllable.

"Well, Xavier," I exclaimed, when we were alone. "What do you think of our seance? Rather stormy, was it not?"

"Goron, I am too much ashamed of myself to dare even to thank you. I feel in a dream. But how did you ferret it all out? What clue did you have?"

"Oh, I had a clue. But there is your sister, worrying herself to death. Go at once to her, and tell her she need not trouble to order a wedding cake for you. One word more. Ask your sister to tell her butler to bring up a bottle of Mouton Rothschild. I promised to dine with her and you—if all went well."

It was one of the pleasantest dinners I can remember. The Mouton Rothschild had been religiously emptied. We were smoking cigarettes, when Xavier said:

"And now tell us what gave you the clue to the affair."

"My dear Xavier, you will see it is all very simple. If people would believe only half the things told them in the course of their lives there would be only half the number of crimes committed. You need not look uncomfortable; others have been taken in like you.

"Your case is divided into two parts. The first, which concerns you specially, is of childish simplicity. It was all a fake. The voices you heard, calling upon you to marry that girl, did not emanate from spirits. Candidly, I am surprised a man of your intellect should have fallen into such a vulgar trap. As to these wonderful soothsayers in Paris, Brussels and Amsterdam, they were all members of the same gang. It was Boissier who gave you the addresses of those sibyls, and Clementine, warned by Boissier, sent one of her staff to the place to receive you.

"The second part of your case, relating more particularly to the girl, was more subtle, and, I own, gave me some trouble. She, I felt, was the pivot of the affair, and on her I centered my attention. Her hands were my first clue. In a suspicious case I suspect everything.

"Here was a girl, the daughter of French parents, with a pair of American hands! I have been to the United States and have noticed the peculiarities of the hands in that country, as elsewhere. Her hands haunted me; I began to fancy they did not belong to her. And that was my starting point.

"I went to Toulouse; saw M. E—— and Madame E——, who had adopted their niece, and had a profitable talk with them. They showed me the portraits of Germaine's parents, true types of the Latin race; and I learned from them that the Bradley's, the farmers who at one time took charge of Germaine, also had a little daughter. On my return to Paris I communicated by cable with the American authorities, and with admirable courtesy they replied the second day that Lily Bradley and her parents were dead.

"The conviction then stole upon me that your fiancee was not Germaine, but the farmer's child; my only way to test the truth was to organize a seance, and—without play upon words—turn the tables upon those who used spiritualism to swindle you. You saw what happened. Leroy is one of my men. His father was a low comedian, who taught his son ventriloquism.

"As to that terrible noise you heard, it is produced by smearing two little planks with rosin, and rubbing them violently against one another."

Xavier and I had a violent dispute about the wretched Boissier. Early the next morning my friend called on me, and told me that this matter could not go further, on account of the "scandal." How I hate that word! How many crimes have, within my knowledge, remained unpunished, because the victims, belonging to the higher classes, dreaded what they termed the "scandal." Madame A——, too, came to the rescue, and, to my sorrow, I had to let the fellow go.

For all that, vengeance overtook Boissier. When he returned home, he found the man Riviere had broken open his trunk, stolen all his money, and disappeared.

Two years later I recognized Boissier among a lot of vagabonds the police had found huddled together in a shed near the Central markets. He had become a horrible wreck.

M. E—— and his wife took charge of Lily Bradley. As they told me afterward, the girl had sinned, but had also been sinned against. Having once befriended her, they would not throw her upon the world.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Worked as Tailor by Day and Burglar by Night

CHICAGO.—In the daytime Joe Graeber, thirty years old, undersized and agile, sat cross-legged in his little tailor shop at Twenty-sixth street and Northwestern avenue, and stitched with industry. He worked hard and was acquiring the reputation of being an honest and thrifty tradesman.

But at night Joe Graeber, the tailor, became another man. The deft needle work was dropped and forgotten and instead and quite as skilfully, Joe wielded the "jimmy."

The sharp, frosty crack of something that might have been ice under foot, and again might have been glass breaking, attracted the attention of Patrolmen Stevens and Muse, in Northwestern avenue, near Twenty-seventh street, about 2 o'clock in the morning. Just across from where they stood were two stores, and between them was a narrow passage. They watched silently in the shadow of a building, and did not have to watch long. The sound was repeated, and after a moment's silence a shadow that seemed a part of the wall of the building separated itself from the entrance of the dark passage.

"Here, you—up with your hands—I'll shoot," commanded Stevens. The shadow melted back into the passage and became a noise of running. A second sharper command brought Joe Graeber, the tailor, to a halt.

"You know me, boys, don't you, boys?" he said. "You scared me so I ran."

Stevens and Muse looked with surprise into Graeber's face. They both knew him and said so. But they couldn't understand why the honest tailor should be just where Graeber was.

Graeber confessed. He said he tried to pay rent tailoring and couldn't so he took to burglar work at night.

Clinging Gown Nearly Costs This Man His Life

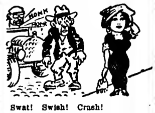
ATLANTA, GA.—Form fitting feminine fashions—and you all know what they mean—a six cylinder automobile and a stranger in our midst from the country were the dramatis personae in a fall curtain opener that electrified pedestrians on the Whitehall viaduct at the luncheon hour.

It all happened at the crest of the noon halt in business. At the Alabama street end of the viaduct the throng was thick and busy.

There came along, with the grace of a Godiva and clad almost as snugly as one, a member of the feminine population of Atlanta adorned in the extreme fashion of today as it applies to the softer sex. You understand about those tight skirts, of course.

This vision was nearing Alabama street when across the viaduct strode a sturdy specimen of the best yeomanry that Georgia produces.

He had half way negotiated the streets, congested at best, when Tha hit by the buck ague, he came to a dead stop in his tracks—something like a pointer comes to a full stop and points game. He was enthralled. Vision crossed his horizon. As though



Swat! Swish! Crash!

He was plastered against one of the plate glass windows of a viaduct clothing store.

A six cylinder machine, going at really a moderate gait had lunged into him.

Bystanders who had witnessed the play dashed quickly to his assistance. He "beat them to it." Swiftly he scrambled to his feet. With one jump he recovered his hat; with a lightning stroke he pulled down his coat, which had covered his head in transit. He wasn't hurt, a bit. But scared! Before kindly help reached his side one long, continuous streak spoke of his disappearance down toward union station.

Ancient Egyptians Used Our Up-To-Date Styles

ECYPTIAN LADY 1912 BC
WHAT A FUNNY LOOKING GOWN.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Inspired probably by the recent highly successful fashion show of 1912, in which was displayed the very latest progress of sartorial art, from double decked coiffures to diamond heeled slippers, Professor A. L. Kroeber, curator of the Museum of Anthropology at the affiliated colleges, arranged an exhibition of fashion in retrospect, with considerable emphasis on what they were wearing in Egypt and such places in the fall of 1913 B. C.

The exhibition was thrown open to the public, and the weary husband who thinks his wife looks queer in her new French togs that cost none but husbands know how much should go out that way.

Professor Kroeber and his assistant, E. W. Gifford who gives the lecture, are of the opinion the change is less than slight, and they have proceeded with a delicate sense of irony to contrast some of the new styles with the old.

There is a plaster cast of an Egyptian lass wearing one of those gowns that begin to hobble right at the neck and never vary all the way down, except as nature asserts itself. This effect is popular, also, in 1912.

The women of Crete were wearing corsets about the same time—four thousand years ago. They have such a corset in the museum, and it looks like one of a pair of puttees worn by a stout cavalry officer.

One whole glass case is labeled:—

"Secrets of Beauty, Past and Present."

Inside there is a quite modern "lay-out" of rouge, powder and mirror, and alongside lie the implements with which some dusky Cleopatra touched herself up to win an Antony's praise and admiration.

Judge's New Domicile Keeps Things Sparkling

CLEVELAND, O.—Shocking! Perfectly shocking!

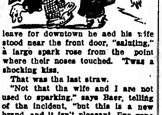
That's what is said of the home of George Baer, municipal judge, at 1728 East One Hundred and Sixteenth street. And the house is shocking—the judge admits it.

"Ecstatically sparking," Baer adds.

When the judge's wife arose the other morning and started to ply a comb through her locks a crackling sound arrested her. She dropped the comb and felt of her sleeve connection. There had been no rip, but when she started to comb again the crackling resulted.

She touched the judge on the forehead to awaken him. A little spark jumped up more promptly than his honor.

"Here's your coffee, George," she said at breakfast, and as he reached to take it their fingers touched and another little spark jumped from the contact point of their digits.



And then—and here's the real reason for the investigation started by Baer—when the judge was about to leave for downtown he and his wife stood near the front door, "saluting," a large spark rose from the point where their noses touched. 'Twas a shocking kiss.

That was the last straw.

"Not that the wife and I are not used to sparking," says Baer, telling of the incident, "but this is a new brand, and it isn't pleasant. I've gone to the telephone and electric light companies to see what the trouble is. The whole place seems to be charged with electricity.

"Only the other night Judge McGannon and his wife came out to the house and a spark rose when he and I shook hands."

In the PUBLIC EYE

CRUSHED AN EMPIRE IN FOUR DAYS

Military experts are eagerly looking up details as to the career of Savoff of Bulgaria, conqueror of the Turks. In four days, out of the shadows of the Balkans, he has risen to eminence among European military commanders. His campaign in Thrace, leading southward in a series of desperately fought and brilliantly maneuvered battles to the gates of Constantinople, has written a new chapter in the science of warfare.

The great "turning movement," the speed with which he moved his forces, his marvelous success in keeping his heaviest artillery apace with infantry and cavalry are all separate chapters of a dramatic war yet to be written.

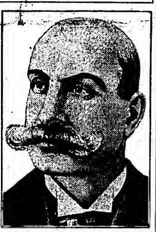
Turning to the man himself, there is the most meager information concerning him. The situation called for one of his abilities and he responded. All that is known of him is that he is yet a young man, being only forty-two years old. He is a native Bulgarian, a graduate of the Bulgarian military school, who later took special courses in military science at St. Petersburg, Paris and Berlin. He is of medium height, dark like all Slavs, lithe, sinewy, endowed with tremendous energy, impetuous and gallant.

In camp Savoff is 100 per cent pure soldier. In drawing room and salon he is a courtier—handsome, polished, a favorite with the ladies, a splendid figure of a man with hair and eyes as black as night and a delicate upturned mustache also colored like the raven.

Until the outbreak of hostilities Savoff was colonel of the Ferdinand or King's Own regiment of Bulgaria. This position at court may have been responsible primarily for his selection to command the army of Bulgaria at the opening of the campaign, but the results show how well placed was King Ferdinand's confidence.

It is recorded of Savoff that long ago when he first began his military career he planned his campaign against Turkey.

DR. EMIL HIRSCH FAVORS PORK CHOPS



Dr. Emil G. Hirsch, preaching to the young Jews of Chicago, who are "departed from orthodoxy and lacking religious anchorage," under the auspices of the People's Synagogue association, created a sensation when he denounced the devotion to "superstitious observance that characterizes orthodoxy in some of its manifestations, and said:

"I urge you that, instead of pondering about the observance of the dietary laws, abstaining from certain foods, you lead lives of righteousness and help to spread our religion among the people. We believe in one God and that God in spiritual form. Let us carry his word to our brethren.

"The Reformed Jewish church has nothing to do with obsolete forms of religion. It has to do with the unification of the peoples of the earth under one God, and the koshering of meat is far less important in our scheme of things than the rescue of human beings from moral, intellectual and spiritual chaos.

"The pork chop is just as much my meat as your meat or any man's meat. The only thing I have against pork chops is their price. No superstition that taboos pork has any terrors for me or any other reformed Jew.

"We have nothing to do with ancient and abandoned tribal Juju. We do not believe that the hog was the ancestor of any branch of the Jewish race, and this is the basis of the superstition that taboos pork in orthodox circles.

"There is a well-known type of Jew referred to among his own kind as a 'Ham Orthodox,' which means a man who professes orthodoxy but eats ham.

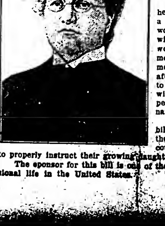
"The hog was a totem with some ancient tribe that became Jewish perhaps. The hog was regarded as an ancestor of the tribe, and the superstition has been handed down. It became a religious fetish.

"The orthodox Jews believe that a great day must come when all Jews will be reunited under a King of the House of David.

"We do not believe that the Jews will ever again be an independent nation. We expect evry Jew to do his duty as a man wherever he may be called.

"The higher the Jew may rise in the councils of the nation to which he is accredited, the better for the Jew and the better for the nation. As to pork we have realized as reformed Jews that the law against pork has been perpetuated as a hygienic and prophylactic measure and that it has no religious significance."

WOULD PENSION ALL U. S. MOTHERS



That each woman who bears a child shall receive a pension of $25 is one of the provisions of a bill which Mrs. Ellen Spencer Mussey, the dean of the Washington College of Law—the only exclusively women's law school in the country—is advocating before congress.

Mrs. Mussey's bill contains a number of unique provisions, all putting a premium on motherhood. She would provide the mother not only with $25 for every child born, but would have the government allow mothers $2.50 a week for three months before and three months after the birth of a child. In addition to this a woman forty-five years old with six children should also get a pension, the amount not yet being named.

Mrs. Mussey, in discussing her bill, said that much of the blame for the white slave traffic in this country could be laid to the failure of mothers to properly instruct their growing daughters.

The sponsor for this bill is one of the most prominent women in professional life in the United States.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

New Herd of Bison of Interest to Scientists

WASHINGTON.—Government scientists in Washington displayed great interest in a dispatch from Winnipeg a few days ago, announcing that Harry V. Radford, the American explorer, had discovered more than 350 wild buffalo in the Slave lake district of the Hudson Bay country.

The wild buffalo of the American plains are gone and nothing remains of them save a few museum and zoological park specimens.

Outside of the national zoological park in Washington, the Bronx Zoo, in New York; Yellowstone National park, and a few other collections of domesticated bison there are no known living specimens of the buffalo in this country, and the last wild herd in the United States is believed to have been exterminated. For many years reports have come out of the Hudson Bay country concerning the existence of a new and distinct species of buffalo, but only within the last ten years have scientists agreed that this species is a different variety from the American bison.

"We are very much interested in Mr. Radford's discovery," said Dr. Richard Rathbun, assistant secretary of the Smithsonian institution, in charge of the United States national museum. "We know this explorer very well. The object of his expedition was to visit the home of the wood bison in the almost unknown region of northwestern Canada, west of the Slave river, and north of the lower Peace river. This expedition started in 1909 and has included track surveys over many hundreds of miles, and furnished Mr. Radford the opportunity of closely studying the wood bison in its haunts, and of making the first recorded observations on this rare animal in life.

"Eighteen specimens were seen by him during the first part of his exploration tour, and under a permit from the Canadian government one was killed by him. It weighed 2,402 pounds."

Officials Assert That Many Wives Are Indolent

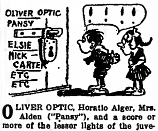
A SHARP arraignment of the farmers' wives and daughters of the country and incidentally their city sisters is contained in a report made the other day by George K. Holmes, chief of the division of production and distribution of the agricultural department. Although wages have risen steadily during forty-four years, Mr. Holmes declares that the women of the present age have forgotten or are too proud to indulge in household work on the farm. The lure of "society," which has reached out to the farm, he says, is much to blame for the conditions, which he described as "acute."

"Country girls, as well as city girls," says Mr. Holmes, in reporting to Secretary Wilson, "seem to regard household labor for hire as undesirable. Joined with this fact is the other one that the women of the farmer's family are neither able nor willing to repeat the manual labor performances of their grandmothers on the farm."

The raising of the standard of living on the farm, the report continues, is responsible in a measure for the women of the farm now engaging in "social functions" which the government expert holds to be "incompatible with the performance of household labor." The passing of the old-time domestic industries is deplored, and Mr. Holmes adds that "it is rare that one of the younger women know how to knit."

"Throughout large areas," he says, "the pride of the housewife in great stores of preserves, dried and pickled fruits, berries and vegetables exists chiefly in history, and dependence is placed mostly upon the local store for the products of the cannery and the evaporator."

Oliver Optic Is Barred in Washington Library



OLIVER OPTIC, Horatio Alger, Mrs. Alden ("Pansy"), and a score or more of the lesser lights of the juvenile literature of a generation ago will suffer a permanent eclipse in the public library of the District of Columbia. The executive committee of the library is co-operating with the teachers to discourage indiscriminate reading of juvenile stories by the youth of Washington.

In the opinion of George F. Bowerman, librarian, books that tend to institute false ideas in the minds of the growing youth, those which force an introspective trend in little girls and those which falsely depict actual conditions of history must be set aside.

Oliver Optic's works are classed as "purposeless."

Horatio Alger's juvenile heroes have too ready a road to success. Of Alger's works the committee said: "G. A. Henty, while not writing any better class of literature than does Alger, stands just across the border line which divides the good from the bad. The mediocre writings of Henty based on historical truths inspire the boys to read better literature. Alger spoils the capacity for better reading."

The "Elsie" books, dear to the hearts of every schoolgirl of the '70s and '80s and heretofore regarded as harmless because so highly moral, are roundly condemned as tending to make a girl introspective and "goody-goody." The same charge with less vehemence of utterance is laid at the door of the "Pansy" series.

"Only a shade worse than Old Sleuth and Nick Carter," is the view of the library committee with regard to a list including the revolutionary series, by George Warren; the college sports series, by Lester Chadwick, and the Jack Ranger series.

When a Herring Is a Herring It Is a Herring

ACCORDING to Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh a herring is a herring when a herring.

The secretary of the treasury, who returned to his office the other day, was called upon to render a decision on what is a herring, and he did it according to the foregoing paragraph. He decided also that a herring is not any one of a number of fancy fishes popularly classed as herring, as many of the importers would like to have the customs officials believe that they are herring.

Like the question, "What is whiskey" and "Is a hen a bird," "What is a herring" has caused considerable trouble to custom officials. Assistant Secretary Curtis wrestled with the herring, that is the herring question, and then passed it on to Secretary MacVeagh and the latter (he having been a wholesale grocer for many years and an importer of herring) promptly held that a herring is a herring, and that anchovies, brisling, sardines, sprats, pilchards and alewives are impostors and hereafter shall not be herrings.

WHAT IS A HERRING ?
A HERRING IS A HERRING WHEN A HERRING —— !

To the importer this means that herrings when imported will be assessed 1 cent a pound if fresh, and half a cent a pound if packed any other way, and that the importers shall pay a duty of three-fourths of a cent a pound, or 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Owned Up.

"You know I refused you half a dozen times before we were married," said Mr. Meekton's wife. "Yes," replied her husband. "I suspect that's what has kept me from ever wanting my own way again."

MENACE OF DRUGS.

The number of people in this country who are becoming addicted to the different phases of what is known as the drug habit is so numerous as to excite alarm. Years ago the victims of drugs were confined to consumers of opium or morphine, says the Milwaukee Wisconsin. Now there is a considerable variety of habit-forming drugs, with cocaine at the head of the list. At first it was hailed for its usefulness as a local anesthetic. Now it is dreaded for the number of men and women who have fallen under its sway, and whom it reduces to a condition of moral irresponsibility. Many—probably nearly all—of the victims of cocaine and other habit-forming drugs use them at first for medicine. They are prescribed by physicians to allay pain. The hideous evils that follow slavery to these drugs rarely are dreamed of by those who use them, until after their use has become a habit, and then the damage is done—for drug habits, once formed, are inconceivably difficult to break. These drugs shatter the nervous system and blunt the moral faculties and predispose their slaves to crime. No wonder that physicians and officials charged with the administration of the criminal laws are banding together to check the sale and use of these insidious destroyers of health and morals.

As our manners improve, have our children as good manners as our fathers or grandfathers had? We do not mean by good manners what the newer term social etiquette implies. Among the so-called social sets we find changing codes which direct the form of handshaking, modes of expression in meeting people, repetition of useless "don't you knows" in conversation, ability to select from multiform knives, forks and spoons for the multiform courses at luncheon and dinner, says the Knoxville Journal and Times. We can detect no purpose in these flippant forms of fashion excepting as the knowledge is a badge of fellowship. And there seems to be much striving to get within the circle. But these mannerisms are not good manners. The essence of good manners is kindness and courtesy. They extend below the surface deep into the character. A person habitually polite is one who has transformed into conduct the habit of thinking of others. They are apostles of good cheer, being unwilling to cause embarrassment or chagrin to either their social confreres or the lowliest person they meet.

They pay the waiter for the privilege of being served at all, after paying the head waiter to get a table if the restaurant is full. They pay to have their hat and coat kept for them during the meal, pay for getting a taxicab, and after it is over and pay the chauffeur for the privilege of riding home with him in a cab for which the company has had to pay the hotel license fee for the right to use the public streets, says the New York World. From the time they enter a restaurant until after they have left it they are subjected to numerous direct taxes, in addition to the indirect taxes imposed for music and marble corridors, which are but ill-disguised in the exorbitant prices charged for the food. Why should not the Hotel association round out the system of petty extortion by charging for admission?

If, as reported, the sultan of Turkey sent a bag of millet seed to the king of Bulgaria to show his numerical strength, and the king of Bulgaria sent back a bag of pepper seeds to show the style of opposition, the incident typifies the struggle between quantity and quality which has had but one result since the world began. Mere brute strength and number no longer count in the great contests of the world.

The little Irish cow has proved a prize winner at the National Dairy Show in Chicago. Lord Decies exhibited a herd of ten, which was awarded several first prizes, and three seconds. Cows competent as these would beat the pig for paying the rent.

An English woman left $500 in her will to another woman for smiling pleasantly at her as they left church. Such a bequest does more for the sunshine habit than any amount of mere talk.

The society leader who proposes that dog shall be eaten as a relief from the high cost of meat, should begin as an example. We do not know of any law prohibiting the consumption of Boston bull steak or poodle chops by the gilded circles.

Cholera killing 10,000 out of 21,000 cases reported in one province in India in a month is described as not being as severe as usual. What would they call severe, anyway?

WILL DISSOLVE TRUST

U. S. COURT UPHOLDS ACTION AGAINST BATHTUB COMBINE.

Dealers in Enameled Ware Goods Are Accused of Violating Sherman Anti-Trust Law.

Washington, Nov. 20.—By declaring illegal the enameling "license agreements" which hold manufacturers of sanitary enameled ironware together in the combination known as the "bathtub trust" the Supreme court of the United States delivered a death blow Monday at violations of the Sherman anti-trust law under the cloak of the protection of the patent laws.

The fight against the enameled ware manufacturers was begun by the government in the United States district court of Maryland, it being charged that the 50 defendants named had brought about a combination to restrain interstate trade in sanitary enameled ironware and had attempted to monopolize that trade. Sixteen of the defendants were corporations.

SPARKS FROM THE WIRE

Ottumwa, Ia., Nov. 21.—The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railway's Southwest Limited, between Kansas City and Chicago, was held up Tuesday by two bandits between Ottumwa and Mystic. The men boarded the train at Mystic and, after robbing the passengers, held them prisoners until the train entered Ottumwa. The loot amounted to about $350.

Kingston, Jamaica, Nov. 22.—It is believed that more than 100 persons lost their lives at Montego bay during the recent hurricane and tidal wave that devastated parts of the island. Forty-two bodies were recovered from the bay Wednesday and the search continues. The town is practically swept away.

The towns of Lucea and Green Island were devastated, only five out of 300 houses remaining standing in Lucea.

Mexico City, Nov. 22.—The town of Acanbay, in the northern part of the state of Mexico, was destroyed by an earthquake. It is said that the victims numbered a hundred. The town had 2,000 inhabitants.

Gibraltar, Nov. 22.—The United States cruisers Montana and Tennessee arrived here. After coaling they will proceed to Turkish waters.

Washington, Nov. 22.—Charles D. Hilles again is private secretary to the president. The chairman of the Republican national committee has resumed his position at the White House, taking the place of Carmi Thompson, appointed treasurer of the United States.

Washington, Nov. 22.—Senator Rayner is not expected to last through the day. He has been conscious only at intervals during the past twenty-four hours.

Rebels Beaten in Fight.

El Paso, Tex., Nov. 23.—In a battle Thursday, near Madera, Chihuahua, federals under Gen. Jose Blanco defeated two bands of rebels commanded by Richardo Terrazas and Juan Ramos, killing twelve rebels.

Red Cross Aids Soldiers.

Washington, Nov. 23.—The American Red Cross sent $8,000 to the Balkans Thursday for the relief of Turkish, Bulgarian and Servian troops. This makes a total of $48,000 sent from the United States.

RACE SUICIDE IS HIT

POSTAL AUTHORITIES ARREST DOCTORS AND DRUGGISTS IN SEVENTY-TWO CITIES.

TWELVE TAKEN IN CHICAGO

United Crusade Against Illegal Practices Is Begun in All Parts of Country—Investigation Began Two Months Ago.

Chicago, Nov. 22.—Raids were made in nearly every section of the United States simultaneously Wednesday by postal inspectors, when a nation-wide crusade against doctors, druggists and other persons advocating methods conducive to race suicide was begun.

Ten men and women were arrested in Chicago alone, but the government's net, spread over the whole country, brought in a total of 173 persons from 72 different town and cities. The defendants are charged with using the mails to promote criminal medical practices or the sale of drugs and other materials for illegal purposes.

The defendants are charged with violating section 497 of the postal laws and regulations by sending advertising matter and articles through the mails calling attention to various remedies. The Chicago defendants were taken to the quarters of United States Marshal Hoy.

The number of arrests made were as follows: Chicago, 12; Portland, Ore., 9; Seattle, 8; Oakland, Cal., 8; Cincinnati, 8; San Francisco, 7; Pittsburg, 7; Indianapolis, 5; St. Paul, 5; Denver, 5; Spokane, 5; Oklahoma City, 5; Forth Worth, 4; Omaha, 4; St. Louis, 3; Buffalo, 3; Los Angeles, 3; Mobile, 3; Marietta, O., 3; San Jose, Cal., 3; New York, 2; Albany, 2; Washington, 2; Memphis, 2; Birmingham, 2; Steubenville, O., 2; Cleveland, 2; Duluth, 2; Winona, Minn., 2; San Antonio, 2; Houston, 2; New Orleans, 2; Kansas City, 2; Topeka, 2; Alameda, Cal., 2; Atlanta, 1; Toledo, 1; Minneapolis, 1; Galveston, 1; Salt Lake City, 1; Ithaca, N. Indicted for Boy's Murder.

Buffalo, N. Y., Nov. 21.—An indictment charging murder in the first degree was returned by the supreme court grand jury here against J. Frank Hickey, accused of the murder of seven-year-old Joseph Josephs of Lackawanna.

Rockefeller Gives $5,000.

Washington, Nov. 22.—John D. Rockefeller contributed $5,000 to the American Red Cross Wednesday for use in relief work in the Balkan states. Mr. Rockefeller's contribution makes the American total $40,000.

Oldest U. S. Ship Out of Commission.

Vallejo, Cal., Nov. 22.—The century-old receiving ship, Independence, the oldest vessel in the navy, was placed out of commission at Mare Island navy yard Wednesday. The cruiser Cleveland takes her place.

4 GUILTY OF MURDER

N. Y. GUNMEN CONVICTED OF ASSASSINATING ROSENTHAL.

Fate of Prisoners Was Sealed After Jury Had Deliberated Only an Hour.

New York, Nov. 21.—Charged with the killing of Gambler Herman Rosenthal, the gunmen "Gyp the Blood," "Lefty Louie," Whitey" Lewis and "Dago Frank" Cirofici were all found guilty of murder in the first degree by a jury in the supreme court here Tuesday.

The jury deliberated only an hour and ten minutes. The quick verdict came as a surprise to everybody.

Justice Goff remanded the prisoners until he fixes the day for pronouncing sentence. The entire proceedings in court after the jury came in occupied only seven minutes. The gunmen were brought in by four prison wardens and a uniformed police. They heard the verdict with faces unmoved, staring straight ahead.

Enraged by their conviction, the four gangsters returned to the tombs profanely denouncing Justice Goff and all others who were concerned in their trial. Their counsel at once served notice of an appeal.

Their agreement with the state fulfilled, Jack Rose, "Bridgey" Webber and Harry Vallon were released from custody. The indictment against William Shapiro, chauffeur of the murder car, whose testimony against the four defendants is declared to have decided the issue, was also dismissed, and Sam Schepps was likewise permitted to go free.

Jack Sullivan, last of the seven men indicted for the Rosenthal murder, will be placed on trial immediately following the trial of Charles H. Hyde, which began Wednesday.

THREE PLUNGE TO DEATH

Guests Cut Off From Escape When St. George Hotel Burns in Los Angeles.

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 21.—Three persons were killed and twenty injured in a fire at the St. George hotel East 3rd street, near Main, which started at midnight Tuesday. The fire was discovered on the second floor and drawn up through the elevator shaft, it spread so rapidly that those on the fifth and sixth floors who did not receive the warning in time were compelled to jump from the windows. Those who lost their lives jumped from the upper floors.

Enters Station With Bomb.

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 21.—Police of the Central station were driven into the street by a man wearing a mask shaped like a monkey's head, who carried a box which contained an infernal machine and which he threatened to explode if molested. By a ruse he was captured.

TERMS ARE REFUSED

OTTOMAN GOVERNMENT ORDERS COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF TO RESUME WAR.

PEACE CONDITIONS DRASTIC

France Warns Turks Against Doing Violence to Christians—Atrocious Acts of Butchery Laid to Servians—Slaughter Women and Children.

London, Nov. 23.—Nazim Pasha, holding by desperate effort the defense lines of Tchatalja and fighting within his rapidly dwindling ranks a frightful epidemic of cholera, was notified Thursday by the government at Constantinople that the Bulgarian proposals for an armistice had been rejected and ordered to resume operations at once. Thus the Turkish army must fight on, to a decisive end.

This note was made public by the porte:

"The porte, finding the Bulgarian conditions for an armistice unacceptable, has ordered Nazim Pasha to resume military operations."

The note was supplemented by the following statement by Kiamil Pasha, the grand vizier:

"I have received through the Russian ambassador to Turkey the terms which the Bulgarians suggest for an armistice as a preliminary to the discussion of terms of peace. These terms are impossible and unless they are radically altered the war will continue.

"The Bulgarians ask for the surrender of Adrianople, Scutari, Janina and the Tchatalja lines."

There is still a strong possibility of the Bulgarians making an entry into Constantinople and the powers are again considering action to prevent such an eventuality. France took the initiative by notifying the Turkish government that she would hold Turkey responsible for any violence against Christians.

Vienna, Nov. 23.—Lieutenant Wegner, the war correspondent of the Reichspost, telegraphed Thursday that while at Nish he heard well-nigh incredible details of the barbarities committed by the Servian troops on the Albanians. A Red Cross doctor with the Servian army told him:

"The Servians gave no quarter. All the Albanians, armed or unarmed, as well as the women and children, who fell into their hands, were mercilessly killed. General Stepanovitch, the Servian commander, had the Albanians captured at Kratovo formed into two rows and shot dead with machine guns, the general saying:

"'We must extirpate those Austro-Hungarian favorites.'

"General Zivkovitch also had 950 Albanians and Turkish notables cut down near Sienitze. After the battle of Kumanova numerous wounded Albanians and Turks were buried with the dead."

TO PENSION EX-PRESIDENTS

Carnegie Corporation of New York Will Provide $25,000 Per Year for Ex-Executives During Life.

New York, Nov. 23.—Following a meeting of the trustees of the Carnegie Foundation held in the home of Andrew Carnegie Thursday it was announced that it had been decided to offer pensions to the future ex-presidents of the United States and to the unmarried widows of ex-presidents. The offer will be made to those entitled to it without application being made. The announcement covering this part of the meeting is as follows:

"Provision has been made through this corporation for a pension for each future ex-president and his widow unmarried, of $25,000 per year as long as these remain unprovided for by the nation, that they may be able to spend the latter part of their lives devoting their unique knowledge of public affairs to the public good, free from pecuniary cares. These pensions will be promptly offered to the ex-presidents or their widows so that no applications will be required from them."

Under the terms of the announcement President Taft, when he retires on the fourth of next March, will be offered $25,000 by the Carnegie corporation.

The question of making provision for our ex-presidents has been one widely discussed with suggestions that congress pass a bill providing for them.

The meeting was the second annual one that the corporation has held. There were present Andrew Carnegie, Elihu Root, Henry S. Pritchett, Robert S. Woodward, Charles L. Taylor, William N. Frew, Robert A. Franks and James Bartram. The latter is Mr. Carnegie's secretary.

Shoots Stepmother and Himself.

Hammond, Ind., Nov. 23.—Frank Cravens, aged nineteen, in a trivial quarrel shot his stepmother, Mrs. Lincoln Cravens, here, Thursday, and then fired a bullet into his own body. Both will die, physicians say.

French Aviator Killed.

Rheims, France, Nov. 23.—Andre Frey, the well-known aviator, was killed here Thursday. When flying around the aerodrome his aeroplane collapsed and he fell a distance of over 150 feet.

Big Skyscraper Falls.

Portland, Ore., Nov. 23.—Eight floors on the Sixth street side of the Marquam building, a skyscraper in the heart of the business section of the city, collapsed here Thursday. No one was injured.

FOR SCIATIC RHEUMATISM

Try the Treatment That Cured This Pronounced Case in Minneapolis After Other Treatments Failed.

Sciatica is neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. Its origin is generally rheumatic and is the direct result of taking cold. For this reason the disease is commonly known as "sciatic rheumatism." That Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cure this disease is shown by numerous cases like that of Mrs. J. B. Hansen, of No. 221 Twentieth Ave., So., Minneapolis, Minn. She says:

"A few years ago following an attack of the grip I was taken with sciatica. For six years I suffered untold agony and thought it would be a blessing to me if I could only die. There were sharp, shooting pains in both of my limbs and my shoulders and arms were affected also but not so severely. If I moved about quickly, the pain would catch me so that I had to scream. My limbs would swell until I could hardly walk. I also had a terrible dull pain in my back which was often unbearable. I was confined to bed for a week or two at a time. While suffering from the sciatica I was further run-down by weakness common to women of my age.

"I received so little relief from the doctor's medicine that I became discouraged and quit it. My husband urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as he had read how they had cured cases like mine. I felt better after I had taken the pills a short time but took several boxes until I was certain I was cured. I give this statement of my cure thinking that other sufferers may be helped as I was through using Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."

The tonic treatment with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills succeeds where other treatments fail because it is based on the sound medical principle that the health of the nerves depends on pure, red blood.

Every person who is interested in the home treatment of nervous disorders should send for a new edition of our booklet entitled, "Diseases of the Nervous System, Their Nature, Symptoms and Treatment." Address the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are for sale at all druggists, or will be mailed to any address, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y. Adv.

Usual Kind of Office Seekers.

"Well, how's every little thing, now that election is over?" asked the recently arrived washing machine agent.

"'Bout as they are every place else, I reckon," a bit pessimistically replied the landlord of the Turgidtown tavern. "The banker, the storekeepers, the lumber yard man, the doctor, the stock buyer, the blacksmith and all the rest of the business men who have always 'peared to be capable of managing their various sized affairs successfully, are going on calmly and carefully attending to 'em, while all the triflin', one-gallused incompetents that have never had any affairs of their own to attend to and wouldn't be capable of conducting 'em properly if they had any, are out hotfoot and hell-bent to get and manage the post office for the rest of us!"

HANDS BURNING, ITCHING

905 Lowell Place, Chicago, Ill.—"The trouble began by my hands burning and itching and I rubbed and scratched them till one day I saw little red sores coming out. My hands were disfigured and swollen, and troubled me so that I could not sleep. They were cracked and when the small sores broke a white matter would come out. I could not do any hard work; if I did the sores would come out worse. For two years nobody could cure my eczema, until one day I thought I would try the Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I used warm water with the Cuticura Soap and after that I put the Cuticura Ointment on my hands twice a day for about five or six months when I was cured. (Signed) Sam Marcus, Nov. 28, 1911.

TIRED BLOOD RETARDS DIGESTION

(Copyright 1912 by the Tonitives Co.)

When the blood is tired, it fails to supply sufficient gastric juice to properly digest the food, and we have Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Nausea, Heartburn, Gastritis, Bad Breath, etc. Building up the blood is the only way to prevent and cure this condition. For this purpose, Tonitives will be found of great value, because of their action on the blood, they help to supply the necessary gastric juice, and also to increase the strength of the muscles of the stomach. 75c. per box of dealers or by mail.

MADMAN IS KILLED

COUNTRY TERRORIZED BY ESCAPED LUNATIC WHO DANGEROUSLY WOUNDS BOYS.

IS CORNERED IN BARN.

Fights to End, Seeking Death of Officers—Victim May Die—Happens at Hamel, Minn.

Hamel, Minn., Nov. 25.—A strange man on horseback shot and wounded two persons near here, terrorizing the whole countryside and then succeeded in escaping for a time. A posse, headed by Sheriff Otto Langum and a half-dozen of his deputies scoured the surrounding territory finally capturing the desperado or maniac.

The Wounded.

The older Lenzen has four revolver wounds and his life is despaired of.

The younger Lenzen was hit but once and his condition is not believed serious.

Shots Fired Through Window.

The two Lenzen boys were gathered around the kitchen stove, talking with their mother Friday evening at 9 o'clock. Mrs. Lenzen's back was toward the window. Suddenly a revolver shot rang out and the "ping" of a bullet was heard by Mrs. Lenzen. Six more shots followed in rapid succession and the mother saw both her sons lying desperately wounded on the floor in front of her. All seven shots had been fired through the window.

Desperado Chases Her.

Mrs. Lenzen ran screaming from the house. She saw a mounted man riding rapidly away. When he heard her screams he turned his horse and galloped back toward the house. Shouting and shooting in the air, he threatened Mrs. Lenzen until the frantic woman ran back into her home. Then once more the desperado started off on a gallop.

Riding east from the Lenzen home, which is about a mile and a quarter from the village of Hamel, he encountered on the road a party of young girl's returning to their homes from a neighboring festivity.

According to the accounts given by the girls, the man rode up to them, shouted, and fired his revolver in the air several times, then, as crazily as he had appeared, he disappeared down the road, leaving the terrified girls shaking with fear. He made no attempt to molest them.

Mother Shows Bravery.

Frightened back into the house by the maniac, when she would have secured help, Mrs. Lenzen bravely ran out again shortly afterward and summoned Dr. A. Aubin, who lives nearby. The physician immediately telephoned Sheriff Langum, then took the wounded boys in his automobile to St. Mary's hospital in Minneapolis.

One in Critical Condition.

Matt Lenzen is in a critical condition. He has a bullet in his right lung, another one struck him glancingly on the right temple, and both arms were wounded in the fusillade of the mad rider. The younger boy has a bullet in the calf of his right leg.

Dr. Aubin said:

"The condition of the older boy is very serious. He may not live."

Doctor Captures Horse.

On his way to the Lenzen home Dr. Aubin saw a riderless horse and captured it. It is undoubtedly the horse ridden by the desperado, abandoned shortly after he met the party of girls on the road.

The man was found in a barn on the farm of his father by the sheriff's posse and the barn was surrounded by deputies and farmers well armed. The cornered man held the officers at bay with a rifle. The man's name was Henry Polker and he is an escaped maniac from the Rochester asylum, according to reports. He is 26 years old and was taken to Rochester last spring, being captured after a terrific struggle. He is said to have set fire to a number of barns in the vicinity at that time, which led to his capture as a lunatic. Neighbors say he may have borne a grudge against Lenzens.

The madman was finally shot and killed in a rifle duel with deputy sheriffs, Deputy John Wall fired the shots which ended the life of the infuriated maniac. From his hiding place in the barn Polker saw Wall and Deputy Joe Schutta take a stand in a nearby shed. After a while he ran out of the barn and with a string of oaths on his lips made for the shed, rifle in hand. He fired three times at the deputies, but missed. Wall's first shot missed, so did Schutta's. Then Wall, with a revolver, shot the mad man twice, the bullets causing instant death.

Physician Arrested.

St. Paul, Minn.—Doctor George Lemke, a Minneapolis physician, with offices at 605 Lincoln building, was arrested by George H. Drake, postal inspector, on a federal warrant charging him with depositing a letter in the Minneapolis postoffice telling where and how a criminal operation could be performed. Dr. Lemke was arraigned before Judge Willard in St. Paul. He pleaded not guilty and bail was fixed at $2,500. The arrest of Dr. Lemke was made simultaneously with other arrests in 72 cities.

EBERHART'S PLURALITY.

Large Votes Polled by Three Minor Party Candidates—W. J. Smith Leads Ticket.

St. Paul.—Complete but unofficial returns on the state ticket from the recent election, received at the state capitol, give Governor A. O. Eberhart a plurality of 30,029 over P. M. Ringdal, his Democratic opponent. Large votes were polled by the minor party candidates, and Governor Eberhart's vote was greatly reduced from two years ago. P. V. Collins, the Progressive candidate, ran less than 4,000 ahead of E. E. Lobeck, Prohibitionist, who got an unprecedented vote for a candidate of his party. The Socialist vote also showed a great increase.

BEE INDUSTRY GROWING

Disease Being Wiped Out, Says Inspector in Annual Report—Wants Protecting Laws.

St. Paul.—Of 6,843 hives of bees inspected by John A. Holmberg, state inspector of apiaries, only 334 were found diseased during the fiscal year just closed. Mr. Holmberg made his report to Governor Eberhart. Forty-two hives were found to be incurable and were destroyed. If what is known as the "McElvoy plan" of treatment is continued, the inspector says, with the co-operation of the beekeepers, Minnesota should be free of "foul brood" within a year or two.

"The proper thing to do after cleaning up is to keep clean," Mr. Holmberg adds. "With tons on tons of germ-infected honey shipped from the Western States, 'foul brood' is raising havoc to dealers, jobbers and others in Minnesota. It seems that a law should be enacted to regulate the traffic in this commodity so as not to continually expose our apiaries to the danger of reinfection.

"With the eradication of 'foul brood' in Minnesota beekeeping will receive a new impetus, and we should spare no effort to prevent a recurrence of the condition which threatened the destruction of a great source of income to many of our most useful citizens two years ago. We now have the situation fairly under control; bees were never in better condition for wintering safely; vast fields of white clover—millions of acres—cover a boundless domain; we predict that the number of hives will be doubled during the coming season, and a conservative estimate will place the value of an average crop at more than a million dollars.

"As a net result of our observations during the past year, we believe that an ever-increasing golden harvest awaits those beekeepers who prove themselves worthy of their calling, and who will ever insist upon the conservation of the apiary and who demand the protection and promotion of their interests by those in authority."

Three Counties Organize.

Duluth.—Plans for systematic agricultural work in St. Louis, Lake and Carlton counties have been perfected under the direction of Professor A. D. Wilson of the state agricultural college. Funds for the work will be raised in the three counties, and the new farm school here will be the base of operations. All work will be under the direction of the extension department of the agricultural college. A general supervisor will be employed.

MINNESOTA RICHES

Practical Array of State's Resources for Landseekers At Products Show.

Minneapolis.—The state of Minnesota never made presentation of its resources in more comprehensive and attractive form than at the land show where the state had one of the big booths. The visitor to the show found Minnesota over towards the right after entering, and the white color of the booth impressed one at first. Then came a view of grain, and fruit, and everything that the state produces, not excepting the fish and iron ore and timber.

The display was made for artistic effect, but also with an idea to practicability. No one who visited the booth and asked question was permitted to get away without having it impressed upon him that Minnesota is a big state, that it has 54,000,000 acres of land, that it has summer resorts and is a hunters' and fishers' paradise, that it has farms, and forests, and mines, and that it is growing richer and stronger every year, notwithstanding the fact that opportunities within its borders are being overlooked by people who are pressing on to west Canada.

H. J. Maxfield, commissioner of immigration, was very proud of Minnesota's show, and the state agricultural school men who were over to look it over felt the same way about it. Mr. Maxfield believes that the feature that must impress any one who saw Minnesota's display is the showing of uniformity and stability. The nearness of the Minnesota farms to the great markets, abundance of clear, pure water, the fine opportunities for dairying, and the great undeveloped part of the state, which is just opening up—all these features are shown effectively.

Fine Fruit Displayed.

When it comes to fruit, Minnesota has a record. The western states have advertised their fruit so extensively that they have become identified with fruit growing to a degree that gives them first place in the public mind. Their exhibits show that they are entitled to distinction, but Minnesota, nevertheless, although not ordinarily thought of as a fruit state, raises much very fine fruit every year, and in the placing of the exhibits at the show this feature was brought out.

The great variety of Minnesota soil and the wonderful productive possibilities were shown. Garden products were unusually fine this year and in the Minnesota booth were some very appetizing exhibits.

That the climate of Minnesota is exceedingly healthful; the air is dry and clear—conductive to vigor and to refreshing sleep; that Minnesota is a beautiful state, with rolling land and upwards of ten thousand lakes, large and small, inviting to summer outings, boating and angling, and that the woods in the northern part afford game of various kinds for the sportsman, was told to any visitor who stopped.

Room for Many More.

Visitors were told that although progress has been rapid in building up Minnesota's farms, towns and villages, its schools and churches, its roads and bridges, its telephone lines and rural mail service—yet there are many neighborhoods where the farms are still too large and neighbors too far apart, so that more good farmers will be gladly welcomed.

CELEBRATE OPENING.

Interurban From Fargo and Moorhead to Dilworth Practically Completed.

Moorhead.—The program for the formal opening of the interurban line which is to connect the village of Dilworth with the Fargo and Moorhead street railway loops, was arranged at a luncheon attended by a joint committee of the commercial clubs of Moorhead and Fargo and representatives from Dilworth, Superintendent Nichols of the Northern Pacific and J. M. Manning of the State bank of Dilworth.

The fixing of the date was impossible at this meeting, but it will be announced by the street railway management in a few days. For the opening ceremony a special train will leave Fargo at 2 p. m., carrying the band of Concordia college of this city. It is intended to create a festive air all along the line to Dilworth. Arriving at the terminal in the village there will be expressions of congratulations on the opening of the connecting link between Dilworth and the Twin Cities of Fargo and Moorhead. These will be followed by three speeches, one by the head of the Fargo Commercial club, one by the head of the Moorhead club, and one by a representative from Dilworth.

It is the desire of the business men of Dilworth to make a return call to Moorhead and Fargo in the evening of the same day, and for this purpose open house will be kept at the rooms of the Fargo Commercial club, where again there will be an exchange of courtesies.

First Debate Arranged.

Winona.—Arrangements have been practically completed for the debate between the Winona and St. Charles high schools, which will be held on the evening of Dec. 19, probably at St. Charles. If St. Charles is given the location, the choice of sides will be with the Winona team, which will take the negative, the question for debate in the state league this year being, "Resolved, That all railways doing an interstate commerce business should be owned and operated by the government."

HATS FOR SCHOOL OR STREET

Girls, from the kindergarten age up to the sweet girl graduate, are fond of the flexible "made" hats, which they adjust in any manner that strikes their fancy and can handle with little care. These hats are "happy-go-lucky" affairs made of cloth or velveteen or felt or plush. Quite often the fabric used in a coat serves to make a hat to match.

The crowns are cut in sections of four to six pieces and neatly machine stitched together. The brims are interlined and stayed with parallel rows of machine stitching. Where dark colors are used for the body of the hat, gay plaids or checks are used in facings. Silks and velvets are not for these "endurance" hats, but plushes, velveteens and wool fabrics will stand the rough and tumble wear for which they are made.

Small, rather rakish or droll looking feathers are used on them occasionally. But oftener a silk cord finished with small tassels or a millinery ornament in the nature of a small cockade in gay colors is chosen. A little casing is machine stitched to the side of the crown, made of the same fabric as the hat to receive the quill or stem of a feather which may be inserted and pinned or sewed in, as is thought desirable.

Corduroy is one of the best materials for these sensible school hats. A loop sewed in the crown serves to hang them up by or they may be folded and put in the coat pocket.

JULIA BOTTOMLEY.

ART IN ARRANGING FLOWERS

Add the Distinctive Touch, So Much Desired, to the Individual Costume.

Those who have been fortunate enough to travel, and have done so with observant eyes, will have noticed that women of different nationalities have each some special adornment or article of attire which they alone seem to know how to wear to perfection. For instance, the Spanish woman can wear her shawl to the best advantage in a multiplicity of ways while other women merely use it as a wrap, and it has been said that only a French woman can tie a bow.

When it comes to the question of wearing flowers, the girls in southern Europe and the belles of the South Sea Islands run each other very close for the distinction of best knowing the way to use flowers for their personal adornment. Arranged by clumsy or inartistic hands, an almost hideous effect can be obtained, while if woven gracefully in the hair or placed carelessly in the dress, the daintiest finishing touch can be given to a frock.

Tartan Effects.

We are fond of tartan effects at present, and a serviceable coat made on straight lines crosses at the waist and fastens by two buttons, the material hanging straight below, while the finishing touch is given by a square cut collar and revers of tartan, which goes well with the green background of the original coat.

A broad band sloping across the top of the revers between them and the collar is formed of plain material and ornamented by a single button. Tartan faces the cuffs and forms the flap of the deep semi-circular stitched pockets. In the navy boucle cloth this style turned out with tartan is quite effective, and it is often employed when the material happens to be a reversible one, with a surface that is either plain, mixed or indefinitely striped.

Bowl Shower.

A very practical shower for a bride who is to keep house is where the guests are asked to bring bowls. Now just see what a variety from which to choose. There are nests of bowls which come from the least unto the greatest; there are wooden chopping bowls, brass and copper bowls, finger bowls of glass and of metal, mayonnaise bowls, and even a punch bowl. To make fun, part of the refreshments could be served in bowls and the tea in small handless cups which are lovely to use for individual gelatins and jellies. In fact, I think this kind of a downpour would be most welcome.—Exchange.

Smart Coats.

For the long and three-quarter outer garments—and the latter, by the way, are smarter than the full length coat—the rough surface goods are in the first place, the chinchillas and boucles being the first choice. The tweeds make particularly good looking top coats when cut on the correct English lines. The double-faced materials will be quite as successful as during the last season; those showing a plaid under surface lend themselves readily to the building of long coats, the plaid forming the revers, collar and cuffs.

Old and faded or soiled gowns if ripped up entirely before sending to the dyers in flat pieces may be very inexpensively freshened and when cut all over again and made up into a new gown will bear no resemblance whatever to a made-over costume.

COIFFURE MATTER OF STYLE

Arrangement of the Hair Always Something That Must Be Left to the Individual.

Many styles of hairdressing are in vogue at the present moment, so it should be possible for every type to find a becoming coiffure.

There seems to be a tendency among young girls to adopt the high knot on top. This is generally becoming, especially if the hair is at all wavy.

The low pompadour and a coil held in place by a bow is becoming to the very young girl. Several tiny curls sometimes soften the line on the neck.

When the side part can be worn becomingly it is to be recommended, for it gives an air of distinction, a certain "Frenchy" appearance that is extremely smart. Caution should be used, however, in adopting this style, for unless the lines of the face are soft it is apt to give an unpleasing look to the face.

The natural pompadour and the double coil, a sort of horizontal figure 8 at the back, is being worn once more.

Everything is soft in hairdressing just now and the stiff pompadour and puffs of other years are not to be considered.

A pretty coiffure for an elderly woman is the wavy pompadour with a broad coil of the hair on top. Several fluffy curls should hide the hair line on the forehead and also cover the wrinkles that time and trouble may have etched there.

AMAZON HAT

Dashing little hats, with severe but chic lines, are being brought out in Paris. This representative model by Virot is called the amazon hat and is of moire silk, with a pert tricorne brim faced with velvet. Over the rather low crown sweep paradise feathers, which start under a bow of point edge ribbon.

Children's Dresses.

The vogue for belted effects continues to be strong as it was this fall, and Norfolks and Russian dresses are shown in a variety of styles, says the Dry Goods Economist. Middy dresses and Peter Thompsons are also prominent in the new lines. Vest effects, revers and yokes are being used to a great extent. The vogue for simple tailor-made effects continues to be as strong as ever, and elaborate trimmings are seldom used, particularly in the colored frocks.

ALBERTA

THE PRICE OF BEEF

IS HIGH AND SO IS THE PRICE OF CATTLE.

For years the Province of Alberta (Western Canada) was the Big Ranching Country. Many of these ranches today are immense grain fields and the cattle have given place to the cultivation of wheat, oats, barley and flax; the change has made many thousands of Americans, settled on these plains, wealthy, but it has increased the price of live stock.

There is splendid opportunity now to get a

of 160 acres (and another as a preemption) in the newer districts and produce either cattle or grain.

The crops are always good, the climate is excellent, schools and churches are convenient, markets splendid, in either Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

The prices of all farm produce are steadily going downward, and if Wilson calls that special session of congress it will take a big sack of wheat to bring a dollar next fall. Remember this farmers and make your calculations accordingly, if you don't want to get into a financial pinch that will cause you to sacrifice your property to get out of debt.

If President Wilson could be induced to not call a special session of congress, before the regular session is to convene, and one year from now the country would have an opportunity to recover, and become in a normal condition, But if he calls a special session next March, it is just as well to prepare for a financial panic. Wilson was voted in by the younger voters of the United States, who did not suffer under the Grover Cleveland administration, but the great bulk of the wealth of this country is owned and controlled by people who will remember the time that Grover Cleveland called a special session of congress to repeal the silver purchasing act, and what followed? If the factories begin to close down, as soon as that special session is called, look out for the banks to begin to fail, and as soon as they begin to fail the depositors will begin to withdraw their money and hide it in socks as they did from 1893 to 1895 and then the panic is on us. Down will go the price of all produce and living will be cheap to buy, if you can only get hold of the money to buy it. If you read the review of the election last week you know what states are responsible for the election, but the ones that are really to blame for the democratic party coming into power are the leaders of the republican party, who forced the nomination of Taft onto the party at that Chicago convention. Of course the common people will be the greatest suffers by the change in the administration but that Taft gang had become so rotten and corrupt that they had to be put out of business and we are glad that they were put out.

The Roosevelt vote over the country is not bad for a party three months' old, was it Bill? Just wait till the kid puts four years behind it and you'll see something that will make the Donkey and the Elephant, the Waterwagonists and the Debsites all look like a bobtailed shirt on a barbed wire fence next whirl. —Plummer Pioneer.

With wheat at about 70cts a bushel and Flax $1.13 the farmers will note quite a difference in the income of a load of grain this year as compared to last year, but it will be cheaper next year. Of course it don't make any difference in the price of farm produce what party is in power, but we will soon strike the old Grover Cleveland price of 45cts a bushel, for wheat.

The free soup houses will not begin to open up for business until some time next summer, after Wilsons special session of Congress does business for a while, but old ladies will soon begin to darn up their stockings so as to hold their bank deposits.

Queer Wasting.

"Is that so?" chirped Mrs. Wuppler. "My favorite aunt had it and the poor thing just wasted away!"—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Dirty Politics.

We always like to see fair play in politics, and despise a man that can not take defeat without getting sore at the man who got the most votes. Yet there seems to be a couple of sore heads in the 5th, commissioner district, that calls them selves republicans, who were fairly defeated at the primary election by A. B. Mandt for the republican nomination for County Commissioner from that District. Now they are out with a dirty political deal to split up the party vote, in the interest of an opposite party, so as to defeat the regular republican nominee.

We believe in a fair fight as between Mr. Leimers and Mandt for this election, but when, a defeated candidate gets so low down as to go "Plugging" against the man of his party because he fairly defeated him at the Primary Election, then its time, that the voters of the party aroused themselves and sit down on such methods so hard that the promoters and their dirty schemes will be flattened out like a pancake.

Flagged Train With Shirt

Tearing his shirt from his back an Ohio man flagged a train and saved it from a wreck, but H. T. Alston, Raleigh, N C., once prevented a wreck with Electric Bitters. "I was in a terrible plight when I began to use them," he writes, "my stomach, head, back and kidneys were all badly affected and my liver was in bad condition, but four bottles of Electric Bitters made me feel like a new man." A trial will convince you of their matchless merit for any stomach, liver or kidney trouble. Price 50 cents at all Druggists.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

STORY OF THE SEXTANT.

A Chance Observation That Gave Godfrey a Great Idea.

The element of chance plays an important role in invention and in no case is this more strikingly illustrated than in that of Thomas Godfrey, the American who improved upon the quadrant, or, rather, devised the sextant, the basic notion for which he got by noting the reflection of the sun from a pail of water.

Godfrey was a glazier by trade, but he had a taste for mathematics and was a man of some culture.

John Hadley had also invented a sextant, apparently a development of a suggestion of Newton's, found among his papers at his death. Godfrey anticipated Hadley by about one year, but for a long time his claims were not recognized, Hadley receiving the entire credit.

The glazier thus received his inspiration for the instrument that was to prove of such value to mariners. One day, while replacing a pane of glass in a window of a house in Philadelphia opposite a pump, he saw a girl, after filling her pail, put it upon the sidewalk. The observant glazier saw the sun reflected from the window on which he had been at work into the bucket of water. His mind quickly perceived the significance of the situation, and he was thus led to the design of an instrument "for drawing the sun down to the horizon," a device incomparably superior to any that had hitherto been used for the ascertainment of angular measurements.—Harper's Weekly.

THE SIMPLE LIFE.

No Trouble For Australian Aborigines to Break Camp.

An Australian aborigine breaks the monotony of his life by frequent visits to other camps, but his preparations for these holidays have a simplicity about them which must appeal to many a worried housewife. It is thus described by Messrs. Spencer and Gillen in "Across Australia:"

"Apart from ceremonies and dances, the one great break in the monotony of life is paying visits to strange camps. Packing up is not a tedious process. The men simply walks out of camp, carrying his spears, spear thrower, boomerangs and shield; the woman takes the youngest child across her hip, balances a pitchi on her head, and, with one arm round the child and a digging stick in her free hand she is ready for the road. The girl children and younger women look after the puppies, which are never left behind on any account, and, when unable to walk, are carried in pitchis like young babies.

"Two minutes at most is all the time required for an aboriginal family to pack up and start and there is no trouble in regard to the house while the owners are away. If any one chooses to occupy it during their absence he can do so, but the owners will see at a glance who has been in possession while they have been away."

He Found the Ghost.

"Talking about ghosts," said the janitor of one of the best known concert halls in the city, "makes me think of the scare I got the other day when I went into the auditorium after some supplies I had left back on the stage. As I stepped into the place I heard a scraping and hauling on the stage. Some one was puffing and blowing and then whistling a bit. For the moment my hair began to stand up. I managed to get to one of the switches and turned on the light. There was the ghost! One of the piano houses had sent over one of their blind tuners to fix up a piano and there he had been working away in the dark, his tools scattered around the stage and parts of the piano strewn about."—New York Sun.

Hostel and Inn.

At one time the words "hostel" and "inn" were not confined to licensed houses, but were applied to lodging houses. The "inns" of Oxford and Cambridge, very numerous before the introduction of colleges, were regulated by the college authorities. The inns of court were provided for the accommodation of law students. In olden times country houses of the aristocracy, during the absence of the owners, were used as "inns," or guest houses. It was then the rule to hang out as signs the arms of the owners; hence the origin of public house signs. —London Globe.

Making It Easier.

"George Dinglebat, isn't this the ninth time you have asked me to marry you?"

"Very likely, Laura. And say, why can't we have an understanding in the matter—a division of labor, as it were? I'll do the asking, and you keep tab." —Cleveland Plain Dealer.

The Real Thing.

"Do these emotional actresses ever shed real tears?" asked Mrs. Grouch, between acts.

"Sure," replied Mr. Grouch. "Every now and then they hit a bum town and get a peek at the box office receipts."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Accustomed.

Charlie—The doctor says I have a tobacco heart. Madge—I knew it all along, dear. You always cared more for your old pipe than you did for me. —Judge.

A Sort Ananias.

Blobbs—Does Longbow ever tell the truth? Slobbs—Well, I caught him in the truth once, but he tried to lie out of it.—Philadelphia Record.

THE LOCAL NEWS.

We have a fine farm for sale in Deer Park township for only $21 per acre.

Call and see us, when you are ready to make your final proof.

C. L. Clark has been toting coal for the Griffith dredge this week.

Bennie Narverson visited at Sunbeam last evening.

Turn out to that Special Election next Tuesday. Be sure and attend to this.

Mrs. K. Kretzer from Deer Park visited her old state of Washington friend Mrs. W. G. Hunt at Sunbeam yesterday.

Clifford Shuston, made a business trip to Thief River Falls Tuesday, returning Wednesday evening.

Christ Narveson who has been on the sick list for the past eight months is recovering his usual good health.

The Dredges on Ditch 53 are pushing the work forward rapidly and will complete that ditch this fall.

The farmers on this side of the river are fortunate in getting a good machine to do their threshing, if they did wait until rather late in the season.

Thomas Jacobson has four fine working oxen for sale, as he will rent his farm next year. Call and see him if you need some second hand machinery.

Vaughan Bros. and Co. have put in a fine new safe, so as to keep their book accounts safe during the democratic administration, so they can collect when the wave of progressive policy strikes us.

FOR SALE: Four No. 1 work oxen. Powerful, young, and well broke. Also one cow, will be sold cheap, if taken at once. Inquire of S. L. Holm of Highlanding, Minn.

County Commissioner Larson is fighting the election of A. B. Mandt for the reason that he thinks Mandt will be so satisfactory to the people that they will keep him in office, and there would be no more chance for himself in the future.

The farmers on the south side of Red Lake River have been putting in about a weeks work getting the Erickson threshing rig across the river, but it is a fine machine and promises to deliver the goods on its arrival. It started threshing on the farm of Welter McAh dress this morning.

As to the qualifications of A. B. Mandt for county commissioner we want to say; That his honor and integrity and qualifications are beyond any question of doubt, unless you raise the question against him that he is a Norwegian which we understand has been used in some quiet talks.

The special Election has been called to elect a County Commissioner in the 5th, District, to settle the large vote between George Leimers and A. B. Mandt. There will be a large vote polled at this election, as the two sides are lined up for a scrap. Judging from some of the reports from that District there will not be a tie this time.

This issue of The Eleven Towns is printed by Harry and Teddy, but as we had less than two day's notice in which to do the work in we will be compelled to use a few plates. The "boss" has been to the county seat for two weeks celebrating?! —Eleven Towns.

Prehaps it would be better if the boss stayed at the county seat and let the above boys continue to get out the paper, for if they did people would appreciate it as a good neatly gotten out local paper, instead of a rotten political tarn boat and mug wamp, as it got the reputation of being in the last campaign.

SAVING A WORK OF ART.

An instance of the ingenuity exercised by restorers of damaged masterpieces of painting is afforded by the rescue of a famous painting now owned by the widow of the late John Hay, secretary of state.

Mr. Hay had a Madonna by Botticelli which was painted on a wooden panel at least 400 years ago. The wood had begun to crack, and it was feared that the painting would be ruined, but a restorer was found who said he could save it.

The first step was to paste thin strips of tissue paper on the face of the picture, pressing the paper into the uneven surface of the paint. Layers were added until a thick body of paper concealed the picture.

Then the picture was turned over, and the restorer began to sandpaper the board away. After many months of careful work he had all the wood removed, and nothing but the paint adhered to the paper. A piece of linen canvas was then glued to the paint, and the work of removing the paper from the front of the picture was undertaken. It required nearly a year to complete the work, but when it was done the painting was left in shape to last another four centuries.—Chicago Record-Herald.

HE SAW THINGS.

The Boy Obeyed His Dad and Learned to Use His Eyes.

"Be observing, my son," said the father on one occasion. "Cultivate the habit of seeing, and you will be a successful man. Study things and remember them. Don't go through the world blindly. Learn to use your eyes. Boys who are observant know a great deal more than those who are not."

Willie listened in silence.

Several days later, when the entire family, consisting of his mother, aunt and uncle, were present, his father said:

"Well, Willie, have you kept using your eyes, as I advised you to do?"

Willie nodded and after a moment's hesitation said:

"I have seen a few things about the house. Uncle Jim's got a bottle of hair dye hid under his bed. Aunt Jennie's got an extra set of teeth and a lot of false hair in her dresser, ma's got some curls sewed in her hat, and pa's got a pack of cards and a box of dice and a leather covered flask behind the bookcase."—London Tit-Bits.

Night Jobs For the Jeweler.

Under the jeweler's letter box and door bell was a second bell labeled "jeweler's night bell." "Kindly explain," said the visitor. "Is the craving for diamonds and wedding rings so insatiable that you have to get up at night to meet the demand?"

"It is not the prospect of making a sale that gets me out of bed after midnight," said the jeweler, "but the misfortunes of my fellow man. About the only people who ring me up after working hours are those who have a piece of jewelry on that they can't get off and don't dare to wear until morning for fear of blood poisoning. These accidents happen often. Every doctor in town knows I can be routed out in an emergency case, so all rings that must be filed off swollen fingers, all earrings that must be removed from inflamed ears, all necklaces and bracelets that must be taken from bruised necks and wrists without delay are brought to me."—New York Press.

NOTICE

The annual Short Course in connection with the agricultural high school at Thief River Falls will open for the winter terms on Monday, December 2nd, and continue until the spring holidays. This is a part of the extension work required of all Putnam high schools and it will be organized on similar lines to that of last year and will be made as practical and useful as possible.

The subjects taught will include the common branches, agriculture, accounting, some typewriting, cooking, sewing, carpentry and blacksmithing.

The arithmetic will deal exclusively with practical problems and with work closely related to the activities of the student. The bookkeeping will comprise the study of ordinary accounts, as well as of the various forms and uses of commercial paper; it will also include a brief review of commercial law. Agriculture will deal with farm crops, dairying, stock raising and judging, farm mechanics. The latter will permit of the attendance at a school for gas tractor engines in this city, as well as the handling of various forms of smaller gas engines at the Lincoln building. Carpentry and iron work will permit the students to make iron articles for use at home, such as wagons, sleighs, wagon boxes, wheelbarrows, etc. Model frame barns and truss bridges will also be constructed. The cooking and sewing will meet the needs of those taking this work.

Any resident of the state who is over 16 years of age is eligible to enroll for the course; regardless of other qualifications. Lack of book knowledge ought not to keep any ambitious young person from enrolling, and the course will be especially planned for those who can attend school but a few winter months, whether they come from city or country.

Books are loaned to the students and there is absolutely no cost whatever to the students, except that the wood and iron used in the shops will be sold at cost.

The students will be welcomed to all athletic and literary organizations in the high school. Board and room can be easily secured at reasonable rates in good homes in this city.

Further particulars will be furnished by the undersigned on application.

A PERSISTENT ABBE.

Romance of Mountain Road Building in the Pyrenees.

C. L. Freeston in "The Passes of the Pyrenees" quotes the story of Felix Armand, cure of St. Martin-Lys, who pierced a road through the magnificent Gorge de Pierre-Lys in order to bring prosperity to his poverty stricken village. The cure himself marked out the route, "hanging like a spider from the end of a rope over the awful precipices of the Pierre-Lys. After five years' incessant toil the workmen reached the huge mass of rock which blocks the gorge near Belvianes." Still he bravely incited his parishioners to persevere until in 1781 the tunnel was pierced which still bears the name of "Le Trou du Cure." The revolution stopped the work, but after the reign of terror the cure set to work anew.

"A pity the man should be a priest," said Napoleon when he heard of Armand's heroic efforts. "I would have made him a general in my army."

The cure's personal bravery was great. Once when a mine was about to explode a muleteer was seen riding round a corner. The priest instantly sprang out and extinguished a slow match just at its last inch. Armand was made an abbe, but he declined to leave his flock and was buried at St. Martin-Lys with the cross of the Legion of Honor on his breast.

LEGENDS ABOUT DEW.

Curious Beliefs as to Its Origin and Varied Powers.

In many places dew is looked upon as tears of the angels and of the souls in purgatory shed on account of the sins of human beings upon earth, and dew is collected to be used to cure certain diseases, especially those of the eyes, freckles, baldness, cramps, open wounds and cuts, rheumatism, skin diseases, burns, etc.

The virtues of dew as a beauty wash are also well known, remarks the Journal of Religious Psychology. One legend tells how by licking the dew off the plants on a certain morning when all the birds drink it one can learn their language.

Another folk belief is that "naked or with only their shirts on the witches at the time of the new moon collect the dew from the grass with bark sieves. By this means they deprive of their milk the cows that have been pastured on the grass, and as soon as their sieves are full of dew they know that their pots at home are full of milk.

The Polish people of Wongrowitz call the dew on which the birds are supposed to feed ptasie mleko—i. e., "birds' milk."

An Example of Daring.

During the hottest fighting in the Shipka pass the leading battalion of the Russian General Dragomiroff's division recoiled before a hailstorm of Turkish bullets. The general was a very stout person and had the appearance of a peaceful German professor. But when he saw his men recoil he dismounted and walked slowly to and fro along a ridge swept by the enemy's bullets. He was a hundred yards in advance of the men, occupying the position they had abandoned. After staying there for awhile without being touched he shouted back to the battalion: "What are you doing, you geese? Did you think there was danger here? I don't find any!" The men responded with a roar of cheers, doubled up to him and charged so fiercely that the Turks were forced to retreat.

An Unexpected Conclusion.

A mistress was summoned in a London court for having dismissed a servant girl without due notice. The defendant pleaded that the servant was so voracious that she could not keep her in food. The judge after hearing the evidence inquired of the defendant, "Will four and sixpence a week keep her?" "Not nearly," replied the lady. "Will 6 shillings?" continued the judge. "No; that would not keep her," replied the defendant, feeling that in the judge's hands her case was gaining strength. "Now take care," said the judge, "and answer cautiously. Will 7 shillings?" "It takes 8," said the defendant. "Very well," said the judge. "Then you must pay her 8 shillings a week as board wages for one month."—London Mail.

Good Intentions.

"I do my best," said Mr. Glumzle, "to scatter sunshine and encourage a spirit of patience and cheerfulness, but somehow I always go wrong."

"What has happened?"

"I met a friend who looked a little gloomy, so I said to him: 'Cheer up! Nothing is as bad as it might be. Every cloud has a silver lining, and you only make trouble worse by thinking about it.'"

"Didn't he respond?"

"No. He simply said: 'Don't bother me. I've got the toothache.'"—Washington Star.

Heredity.

"Cute little cuss," said Slabsides, gazing at Hawkins' baby, "but why the dickens do you suppose he's trying to get his toes into his mouth all the time?"

"Takes after me," said Hawkins. "He's trying to make both ends meet."—Harper's.

Explaining It.

"There is such a queer smell after the automobiles here besides the gasoline."

The regular retail price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but to introduce we will sell you a sample pair for $4.80 (cash with order $4.55).

NO MORE TROUBLE FROM PUNCTURES
NAILS, Tacks, or Glass will not let the air out.
A hundred thousand pairs sold last year.

DESCRIPTION: Made in all sizes. It is lively and easy riding, very durable and lined inside with a special quality of rubber, which never becomes porous and which closes up small punctures without allowing the air to escape. We have hundreds of letters from satisfied customers stating that their tires have only been pumped up once or twice in a whole season. They weigh no more than an ordinary tire, the puncture resisting qualities being given by several layers of thin, specially prepared fabric on the tread. The regular price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but for advertising purposes we are making a special factory price to the rider of only $4.80 per pair. All orders shipped same day letter is received. We ship C. O. D. on approval. You do not pay a cent until you have examined and found them strictly as represented.

Notice the thick rubber tread "A" and puncture strips "B" and "D" also rim strip "H" to prevent rim cutting. This tire will outlast any other make—SOFT, ELASTIC and EASY RIDING.

We will allow a cash discount of 5 per cent (thereby making the price $4.55 per pair) if you send FULL CASH WITH ORDER and enclose this advertisement. You run no risk in sending us an order as the tires may be returned at OUR expense if for any reason they are not satisfactory on examination. We are perfectly reliable and money sent to us is as safe as in a bank. If you order a pair of these tires, you will find that they will ride easier, run faster, wear better, last longer and look finer than any tire you have ever used or seen at any price. We know that you will be so well pleased that when you want a bicycle you will give us your order. We want you to send us a trial order at once, hence this remarkable tire offer.

IF YOU NEED TI[illegible] don't buy [illegible] price until you send for a pair of Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof [illegible] on approval and trial at the special introductory price quoted above; or write for [illegible] Tire and [illegible] Catalogue which describes and quotes all makes and kinds of tires at about half the usual prices.

DO NOT WAIT but write us a postal today. DO NOT THINK OF BUYING a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone until you know the new and wonderful offers we are making. It only costs a postal to learn everything. Write it NOW.

MONTICELLO RESTORED

MONTICELLO

LODGE and GATEWAY

The MAIN HALL of MONTICELLO

THOMAS JEFFERSON

So said Thomas Jefferson, patriot and statesman, who wrote the Declaration of Independence of the United States, long before he had come into the possession of the estate that is set high on the hills near the town of Charlottesville, Va. And he made his wish come true, for when the estate crowned by the hill known as Monticello, "the little mountain," came to him by inheritance, Jefferson brought into being a mansion that was a century ahead of its time in conveniences and ingenious contrivances and from the designs of which the great architects of today fashion the country homes of wealthy Americans. Monticello is indeed a permanent and magnificent monument to the creative genius of the great statesman.

This historic spot has been restored by its present owner, Congressman Jefferson M. Levy of New York, in whose family it has now been for more than eighty years. It is now in as nearly the same condition it was in Jefferson's day. This is the result of years of search for its original furnishings, and a visit to this great mansion is replete with memories of him who fashioned it and brought for its decoration the works of the greatest artisans of France.

Timely interest attaches to Monticello because of the active efforts of Mrs. Martin W. Littleton and others to prevail upon congress to buy the estate, while Mr. Levy is determined to retain it, both because of the loving care bestowed upon the property by his family and the fact that the public enjoys admission to it as fully and freely as though it were owned by the nation.

Down at Shadwell, which lies in the valley of the Rivana river, two miles from the foot of the little mountain, where Jefferson lived when a lad, they still relate the story of the boy's ambition to some day build a beautiful home on the top of the mountain that overshadowed the lowland wherein was his parental home, and how, finally, he came into possession of Monticello and realized one of his boyish dreams.

The great dome of the mountain did not offer sufficient room for the mansion he had conceived, and ten years of labor with head, heart and hands elapsed before the crest of the hill had been leveled. Seven years more it took to crown this man-made plateau with the magnificent mansion to which presidents, princes and the people have made common pilgrimage to pay homage to the memory of the man whose wonderful mind and tireless energy found time from the affairs of state to evolve one of the most remarkable specimens of Colonial architecture in existence.

Monticello lies about two miles south and five miles west of the busy little town of Charlottesville, and it is upgrade every inch of the way.

Through a typical Virginia town you soon strike into a road barren of houses on either side and you learn from this the first lesson of what the present owner has done to preserve the sanctity of the Jefferson home and estate. From close to the town boundary hundreds of acres on both sides of the road have been bought by Mr. Levy, "to prevent," as he puts it, "the building of any shacks on the approach to Monticello."

Soon you drop to the level of a rippling creek that skirts the base of Monticello to reach the Rivana river, and then begins the climb—winding, turning, twisting around the face of the hill under overarching trees growing so closely together that the sky is visible only in patches.

For three miles this road, which was surveyed and laid out by Jefferson, rises steeply toward Monticello until a sharp turn brings the visitor to the wrought-iron entrance gates that hang between massive brick pillars at the gatekeeper's lodge.

When the visitor has passed into the inclosed grounds the gatekeeper follows up the road a few yards where, to the right, hangs a big brass bell that Jefferson placed there to announce the arrival of guests. Neither by day nor by night has any one ever passed through those gates whose presence has not been announced to those in "the big house above" by the ringing of this bell, a quaint custom that has survived a century and a half.

A turn of road brings into view the old burial grounds of the Jefferson family where lie the mortal remains of Thomas Jefferson, his wife, mother sisters and other members of the Jefferson and Randolph families. In loving tribute, too, the remains of many of the artisans Jefferson brought from Europe to help build his mansion are interred in this plot.

Leaving the grave to the majestic solitude of the forest which surrounds it, the visitor follows the winding road still upward through a magnificent park of oaks, maples and pines until an abrupt turn in the path brings him to the main entrance to the Monticello mansion. To the right, on a lower terrace, is a quaint old mansard-roofed house, built by Jefferson before the mansion was completed, and it was the loom house, where the cotton, linen and woolen cloths for the Jefferson household were woven and spun.

Passing up the "President's walk," flanked by neatly trimmed bay trees, the visitor is brought to the main grounds, the plateau that took ten years to level on the mountain top.

A spacious veranda with tessellated floor leads to the reception hall, a cool, stately room where formal tranquillity is evident in the unusual height of the ceiling, an air of spaciousness and general atmosphere of refinement. The hall is so large and the door of such generous size that a coach and four might be driven through. Just at the entrance, deeply cut into the floor, there is the print of a horse's hoof that was made when the British General Tarleton raided Monticello and rode up the marble staircase, through the magnificent hall and out through the salon on his fruitless search for Jefferson.

To fully describe the curios and relics that are unfolded to the gaze of the visitor would fill a volume. There are so many and each has its story of historic association, all deeply interesting and in all forming a collection that would stock a good-sized museum.

Standing in the entrance one faces the gallery which half encircles the hall—a gallery so gracefully proportioned that Stanford White, the noted architect, declared "the beauty of that gallery may never be reproduced, especially the railing, for every portion of it was made by hands whose art is nearly lost in the modern machine era."

In one corner of this hall is Jefferson's old music stand. Made of walnut, it is almost black from age, and there is pasted under the music shelf a bit of paper upon which Jefferson signed his name.

Next to this rack is a column and capital, the original casts of the model designed by Jefferson from which the pillars of the Capitol were fashioned.

In this corner is the coffee urn Jefferson used during his administration at the White House and in Paris when he was ambassador to France.

Stepping between double glass doors, that have an ingenious mechanism for opening that would be a credit to modern housebuilding craft, the visitor enters the grand salon, an octagonal room with six French windows that reach from floor to ceiling. Here the impression is felt at once of delicate but luxurious refinement. Priceless treasures of art, relics of Jefferson and heirlooms of the Levy family, are stored in this high-ceilinged room.

This salon is, indeed, a room of wonders. Modeled after the state apartment of Louis XIV, it differs from that only in color scheme, for Jefferson chose red for the basic tone in preference to the original green.

Much has been written of the simplicity of Jefferson. To many Monticello signifies only a fine example of Colonial America roominess and comfort. In fact, Jefferson furnished his mansion not with crude manufactures of the Colonies, but fitted his home with all the ornate richness of the finest palaces of continental Europe. And, as in the decorating and furnishing of the building, he was equally esthetic in his care for the creature comfort of his guests.

Most of the things that were in Jefferson's study have been lost track of, but Mr. Levy still has a few, and on one corner of the floor there remain thousands of ink stains made by Jeffersons' flipping off the superfluous ink from his quill.

Of the original articles there remain a flat writing table made by Jefferson, upon which it is said he made the first draft of the Declaration of Independence.

When Jefferson died his relatives and heirs decided they could not afford the great expense of keeping open the house as it then stood. Much of the furniture and furnishings were distributed by will, gift or purchase. Mrs. Martha Jefferson Randolph, daughter of the statesman and executrix of his will, decided to continue her home at Edge Hill, the Randolph estate, and was anxious to dispose of Monticello. The place was sold to James T. Barclay, a missionary, who held it but a short time and then offered it for sale.

Commodore Uriah Phillips Levy, then a lieutenant in the navy, drove from New York city to Monticello to inspect the property and concluded a deal by which he acquired from Barclay the Jefferson mansion and 218 acres of the original estate. It was run down from lack of attention and there was little of the original inside furnishings left. Sentimental reasons prompted the commodore to get back the things that had belonged to the man who built the wonderful house, and for years he sought to regain the articles that had been scattered about the country.

Then came the war of the states, and the commodore, continuing his allegiance to the Union, was declared an "alien enemy" by the Confederacy, the estate was confiscated and the contents advertised for sale at public auction. Again the mansion was partly stripped of its furnishings, and many pieces of furniture were sold at the confiscation sale to families residing in the neighborhood. Some of the articles were returned after the war.

After the war, however, when legal adjustment of the estate of Commodore Levy was had and Jefferson M. Levy inherited the property, Mr. Levy continued the labors of the commodore in restoring the home as Jefferson had planned and left it.

A majority of the articles were recovered, but those pieces that had been taken from the country were beyond reach and few of them were traced. With this as his nucleus, however, Jefferson M. Levy made thorough search of family records and documents, as well as getting information from living friends and relatives who had known the home when Jefferson lived, and from that list he has since attempted to get in his many trips abroad exact duplicates of the works of art, furniture and ornaments originally brought from France by Jefferson. In this Mr. Levy has succeeded with considerable accuracy, fitting up Monticello so exactly as it was originally that Thomas Jefferson might step into the home in spirit and find it familiar with objects intimate with his earthly residence.

A FRIEND'S ADVICE
Something Worth Listening To.

A young Nebr. man was advised by a friend to eat Grape-Nuts because he was all run down from a spell of fever. He tells the story:

"Last spring I had an attack of fever that left me in a very weak condition. I had to quit work; had no appetite, was nervous and discouraged.

"A friend advised me to eat Grape-Nuts, but I paid no attention to him and kept getting worse as time went by.

"I took many kinds of medicine but none of them seemed to help me. My system was completely run down, my blood got out of order from want of proper food, and several very large boils broke out on my neck. I was so weak I could hardly walk.

"One day mother ordered some Grape-Nuts and induced me to eat some. I felt better and that night rested fine. As I continued to use the food every day, I grew stronger steadily and now have regained my former good health. I would not be without Grape-Nuts, as I believe it is the most health-giving food in the world."

Worth Three Times a Diamond.

Nearly all the emeralds mined today come from Colombia. And, in spite of the supposed higher value of diamonds, the emerald is the most precious of gems. Carat for carat, a flawless emerald would bring perhaps three times the price of a flawless diamond in the jewelry market. India, the storehouse of precious stones is credited with producing the first emeralds, but the Oriental emerald is not identical with the modern gem, as it is a variety of the ruby, of green color and extremely rare.

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Annie Gattle, a fellow passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers. Mrs. Wellington bears Little Jimmie's voice. Later she meets Mrs. Whitcomb. Mallory reports to Marjorie his failure to find a preacher. They decide to pretend a quarrel and Mallory finds a vacant berth. Mrs. Jimmie discovers Wellington on the train. Mallory again makes an unsuccessful hunt for a preacher. Dr. Temple poses as a physician. Mrs. Temple is induced by Mrs. Wellington to smoke a cigar. Sight of preacher on a station platform raises Mallory's hopes, but he takes another train. Missing hand baggage compels the couple to borrow from passengers. Jimmie gets a cinder in his eye and Mrs. Jimmie gives first aid. Coolness is then resumed. Still no clergyman. More borrowing. Dr. Temple puzzled by behavior of different couples. Marjorie's jealousy aroused by Mallory's baseball jargon. Marjorie suggests wrecking the train in hopes that accident will produce a preacher. Also tries to induce the conductor to hold the train so she can shop. Marjorie's dog is missing. She pulls the cord, stopping the train. Conductor restores dog and lovers quarrel. Lathrop wires for a preacher to marry him and Miss Gattle. Mallory tells Lathrop of his predicament and arranges to borrow the preacher. Kitty Lewellyn, former sweetheart of Mallory's, appears and arouses Marjorie's jealousy. Preacher boards train. After marrying Lathrop and Miss Gattle the preacher escapes Mallory by leaping from moving train. Mallory's dejection moves Marjorie to reconciliation. The last day on the train brings to Mallory the fear of missing his transport.

Mallory put out his hand: "Would you be kind enough to lend me your razor again this morning?"

"Sure thing," said Ashton. "You'll find your blade in the box there."

Mallory then negotiated the loan of one more fresh shirt from the Englishman, and a clean collar from Ashton. He rejoiced that the end of the day would bring him in touch with his own baggage. Four days of foraging on the country was enough for this soldier.

Also he felt, now that he and Marjorie had lived thus long, they could survive somehow till evening brought them to San Francisco, where there were hundreds of ministers. And then the conductor must ruin his early morning optimism, though he made his appearance in the washroom with genial good mornings for all.

Mallory acknowledged the greeting, and asked offhandedly: "By the way, how's she running?"

The conductor answered even more offhandedly: "About two hours late—and losin'."

Mallory was transfixed with a new fear: "Good Lord, my transport sails at sunrise."

"Oh, we ought to make 'Frisco by midnight, anyway."

"Midnight, and sail at daylight!"

"Unless we lose a little more time."

Mallory realized that every new day managed to create its own anxieties. With the regularity of a milkman, each morning left a fresh crisis on his doorstep.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The Complete Divorcer.

The other passengers were growing nervous with their own troubles. The next stop was Reno, and in spite of all the wit that is heaped upon the town, it is a solemn place to those who must go there in purgatorial penance for matrimonial error.

Some honest souls regard such divorce-emporiums as dens of evil, where the wicked make a mockery of the sacrament and assail the foundations of society, by undermining the home. Other equally honest souls, believing that marriage is a human institution whose mishaps and mistakes should be rectified as far as possible, regard the divorce courts as cities of refuge for ill-treated or ill-mated women and men whose lives may be saved from utter ruination by the intervention of high-minded judges.

But, whichever view is right, the ordeal by divorce is terrifying enough to the poor sinners or martyrs who must undergo it.

Little Jimmie Wellington turned pale, and stammered, as he tried to ask the conductor casually:

"What kind of a place is that Reno?"

The conductor, somewhat cynical from close association with the divorce-mill and its grist, grinned: "That depends on what you're leaving behind. Most folks seem to get enough of it in about six months."

Then he went his way, leaving Wellington red, agape and perplexed. The trouble with Wellington was that he had brought along what he was leaving behind. Or, as Ashton impudently observed: "You ought to enjoy your residence there, Wellington, with your wife on hand."

The only repartee that Wellington could think of was a rather uninspired: "You go to —"

"So long as it isn't Reno," Ashton laughed, and walked away.

Wedgewood laid a sympathetic hand on Little Jimmie's shoulder, and said: "That Ashton is no end of a bounder, what?"

Wellington wrote his epitaph in these words:

"Well, the worst I can say of him is, he's the kind of man that doesn't lift the plug out when he's through with the basin."

He liked this so well that he wished he had thought of it in time to crack it over Ashton's head. He decided to hand it to him anyway. He forgot that the cardinal rule for repartee, is "Better never than late."

As he swung out of the men's room he was buttonholed by an individual new to the little Trans-American colony. One of the camp-followers and sutlers who prosper round the edges of all great enterprises had waylaid him on the way to the battleground of marital freedom.

The stranger had got on at an earlier stop and worked his way through the train to the car named "Snowdrop." Wellington was his first victim here. His pushing manner, the almost vulture-like rapacity of his gleaming eyes, and the very vulturine contour of his profile, his palmy gestures, his thick lisp, and everything about him gave Wellington his immediate pedigree.

It ill behooves Christendom to need reminding that the Jewish race has adorned and still adorns humanity with some of its noblest specimens; but this interloper was of the type that must have irritated Voltaire into answering the platitude that the Jews are God's chosen people with that other platitude, "Tastes differ."

Little Jimmie Wellington, hot in pursuit of Ashton, found himself checked in spite of himself; in spite of himself deposited somehow into a seat, and in spite of himself confronted with a curvilinear person, who said:

"Excoose, pleass! but are you gettink off at R-r-reno?"

"I am," Wellington answered, curtly, essaying to rise, only to be delicately restored to his place with a gesture and a phrase:

"Then you need me."

"Oh, I need you, do I? And who are you?"

"Who ain't I? I am Baumann and Blumen. Our cart, pleass."

Wellington found a pasteboard in his hand and read the legend:

> Real Estate Agents Baggage Transfer
>
> Baumann & Blumen
>
> Divorce Outfitters
> 111 Alimony Avenue, Reno, Nevada
>

Wellington looked from the crowded card to the zealous face. "Divorce Outfitters, eh? I don't quite get you."

"Vell, in the foist place—"

"The foist place,' eh? You're from New York."

"Yes, oritchinally. How did you know it? By my feshionable clothink?"

"Yes," laughed Wellington. "But you say I need you. How?"

"Voll, you've got maybe some beggetch, some trunks—yes?"

"Yes."

"Vell, in the foist place, I am an ezpressman. I deliver 'em to your address—yes? Vere iss it?"

"I haven't got any yet."

"Also I am addressman. Do you vant it a nice hotel?—or a fine house?—or an apartment?—or maybe a boarding-house?—yes? How long do you make a residence?"

"Six months."

"No longer?"

"Not a minute."

"Take a fine house, den. I got some beauties just wacated."

"For a year?—no thanks."

"All the leases in Reno run for six months only."

"Well, I'd like to look around a little first."

"Good. Don't forget us. You come out here for six months. You vant maybe a good quick divorce—yes?"

"The quickest I can get."

"Do you vant it confidential? or very nice and noisy?"

"What's that?"

"Ve are press agents and also suppress agents. Some likes 'em one way, some likes 'em anudder. Vich do you vant it?"

"Quick and quiet."

"Painless divorce is our specialty. If you pay me an advance deposit now, I file your claim de minute de train stops and your own vife don't know you're divorced."

"I'll think it over," said Wellington, rising with resolution.

"Don't forget us. Baumann and Blumen. Satisfaction guaranteed or your wife refunded. Avoid substitoots." And then, seeing that he could not extract any cash from Little Jimmie, Mr. Baumann descended upon Mallory, who was just finishing his shave. Laying his hand on Mallory's arm, he began:

"Excoose, pleass. Can I fit you out vit a nice divorce?"

"Divorce? — me! — that's good," laughed Mallory at the vision of it. Then a sudden idea struck him. It took no great genius to see that Mr. Baumann was not a clergyman, but there were other marriers to be had. "You don't perform marriages, do you?" he asked.

Mr. Baumann drew himself up: "Who says I don't? Ain't I a justice of the peaces?"

Mallory put out his hand in welcome: then a new anxiety chilled him. He had a license for Chicago, but Chicago was far away: "Do I need a license in Nevada?"

"Why shouldn't you?" said Mr. Baumann. "Don't all sorts of things got to have a license in Nevada, saloons, husbands, dogs—"

"How could I get one?" Mallory asked as he went on dressing.

"Ain't I got a few vit me? Do you vant to get a nice re-marriage license?"

"Re-marriage?—huh!" he looked round, and, seeing that no one else was near: "I haven't taken the first step yet."

Mr. Baumann laved his hands in one another: "A betchelor? Ah, I see you vant to marry a nice divorcee lady in R-r-reno?"

"She isn't in Reno and she has never been married, either."

This simple statement seemed to astound Mr. Baumann:

"A betcheller marry a maiden!—in Reno!—oi, oi, oi! It hasn't been done yet, but it might be."

Mallory looked him over and a twinge of distaste disturbed him: "You furnish the license, but—er—eh—is there any chance of a clergyman—a Christian clergyman—being at the station?"

"Vy do you vant it a cloigyman? Can't I do it just as good? Or a nice fet alderman I can get you?"

Mallory pondered: "I don't think she'd like anything but a clergyman."

"Vell," Baumann confessed, "a lady is liable to be particular about her foist marriage. Anyvay I sell you de license."

"All right."

Mr. Baumann whipped out a portfolio full of documents, and as he searched them, philosophized: "A man ought alvays to carry a good marriage license. It might be he should need it in a hurry." He took a large iron seal from his side-pocket and stamped the paper and then, with fountain pen poised, pleaded: "Vat is the names, pleass?"

"Not so loud!" Mallory whispered.

Baumann put his finger to his nose, wisely: "I see, it is a confidential marriage. Sit down once."

When he had asked Mallory the necessary questions and taken his fee, he passed over the document by which the sovereign state of Nevada graciously permitted two souls to be made more or less one in the eyes of the law.

"Here you are," said Mr. Baumann. "Vit dat you can get married anyvere in Nevada."

Mallory realized that Nevada would be a thing of the past in a few hours more and he asked:

"It's no good in California?"

"Himmel, no. In California you bot' gotta go and be examined."

"Examined!" Mallory gasped, in dire alarm.

"Vit questions, poissonally," Mr. Baumann hastened to explain.

"Oh!"

"In Nevada," Baumann insinuated, still hopeful, "I could mery you myself—now, right here."

"Could you marry us in this smoking room?"

"In a cattle car, if you vant it."

"It's not a bad idea," said Mallory. "I'll let you know."

Seeing Marjorie coming down the aisle, he hastened to her, and hugged her good-morning with a new confidence.

Dr. and Mrs. Temple, who had returned to their berth, witnessed this greeting with amazement. After the quarrel of the night before surely some explanation should have been overheard, but the puzzling Mallorys flew to each other's arms without a moment's delay. The mystery was exciting the passengers to such a point that they were vowing to ask a few questions point blank. Nobody had quite dared to approach either of them, but frank curiosity was preferable to nervous prostration, and the secret could not be kept much longer. Fellow-passengers have some rights. Not even a stranger can be permitted to outrage their curiosity with impunity forever.

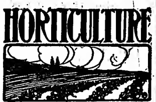
Successful Woman Farmer.

Miss Grace M. Putnam is said to be one of the most successful farmers in New Jersey. She was born and brought up in the city, never even visiting the country until after she was 15 years old. Her farm consists of about five acres and is planted exclusively in cantaloupes. She reports that she rented her farm for the first year. The second year she bought it, the third year she paid up every debt she owed and put $3,000 in bank. She does all the work herself after the first plowing, for which she pays a farmer $12. Her seeds cost her $1 an acre, fertilizer $10 an acre and barrels for shipping one year's crop $60. She sells her melons direct to dealers at $6 a barrel. She thinks her success as a farmer is largely due to the fact that she loves the work better than anything else in the world.

By Natural Reasoning.

A keen student of human nature must have written the following: "When you see a young man sailing down a street shortly after midnight with his collar crumpled, you can make up your mind that there's a young girl crawling upstairs not far distant, with her shoes under her arm and an extinguished lamp in her hand."

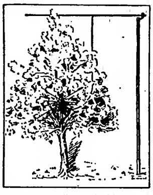


VIBRATION FOR SAVING BUDS

Trembling Motion Is Imparted to All Limbs of Tree, Starting Sap and Affording Protection.

A recent invention relates to a new system of motor operated tree vibration for saving buds and blossoms from frost. The new system aims to create in fruit trees a movement of the sap to the buds and blossoms that tends to vitalize them enough to resist the attacking blight of frost. This movement of the sap might be called a capillary action, and can be likened to the gentle exercising action of an electric vibrator instrument on the human system, which stimulates the flowing action of blood through the veins, especially at the point where the vibrator is applied.

The system for imparting this vibratory action to buds and blossoms has been worked out and patented by Herman L. Darling of Delta, Colo. It comprises the installation in the tree of a small electric motor having a trembling rotary motion and connected by transmitting wires to an electric current.



A Tree Vibrator in Place.

During the months of April and May when the orchard is subjected to sudden freezes, by means of this system a vibratory trembling motion is imparted to all limbs of the tree, transmitted to twigs and buds and this motion starts the sap to circulating, invigorates the buds and strengthens them against the killing effects of the frost.

WAY OF MARKETING APPLES

New Scheme Tried by New England Growers With Apparent Success—How Plan Is Worked.

The objections to marketing apples in the old way through commission men has always given rise to much complaint. A new scheme has recently been tried by New England apple growers.

Under this plan the farmer sells his apples outright to the commission agent for an amount less than their full value. The agency then disposes of the product for as high a price as he can get. At the end of the year he settles with the grower. The amount formerly paid the farmer, as well as storage and transportation costs, are deducted from the gross selling price. The remainder is divided between farmer and commission agent.

The plan, wherever tried, has worked well for both parties. The indifference of the agent to everything but his commission is done away with, for his profits increase with each increase in the selling price of the apples. The new plan has not been very widely adopted as yet, but it is thought that when its advantages are fully known it will largely supplant the old slipshod method.

STACKING UP APPLE BARRELS

Should Be So Arranged That Grain of Heads Will Be Vertical, Thus Securing Greatest Strength.

In the September issue of Cold is described the method of piling apple barrels in storage shown in the illustration. On the floor 2x4 sticks are placed so that they will come directly underneath the head of the barrel and no weight will rest on the sides and bilge. Similar sticks are placed on top of the barrels and another row of barrels placed on them. In this way they may be piled five or six tiers high. Where piled to much height care must be taken that the barrels come directly above each other in the different tiers, and where possible they should be so placed that the grain in the heads will be vertical, as the wood will thus bear the strain with less danger of crushing.

Turkish Counting of Time.

Through the center of the mosque of St. Sophia runs the theoretical meridian which gave the Turks true local time—one hour and fifty-six minutes fifty-two seconds fast on Greenwich—until, two years ago, the new government fell in with the standard system of time zones, and came into the eastern European zone, exactly two hours ahead of Greenwich time. For religious purposes, however, 12 o'clock always happens at sunset, and noon thus wanders with the seasons all round the clock.—Westminster Gazette.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyzer

THE SOIREE AT THE RUE DE PRONY

IN MY journal when I note the many strange incidents in which I have played a part, there are pages on which I do not like to dwell. No, I do not care to glance on these pages finishing in a note of interrogation, somber dramas of which I have known only the first two acts because the principal personages carried the remainder of the story with them into the tomb. These cases have caused me much worry and trouble, and one in particular, entered in my journal as the "Soiree at the Rue de Prony."

We have in Paris a large colony of Spaniards from South America—Chilians, Venezuelans, and others, as a rule enormously rich. They are pleasure-seekers, loud in their dress, noisy in their talk, ostentatious and vain, scattering their money broadcast, to the delight of the Paris tradesmen and restaurateurs.

The people I shall call "Domingues" had taken a charming little house in the Rue de Prony, and, shortly after their arrival, gave an entertainment at which one hundred and forty people were present.

When Monsieur and Madame Dominguez went to their bedroom an unpleasant surprise awaited them. The safe in the dressing room had been broken open, and everything in the way of money, jewelry, and valuable documents abstracted.

The next morning M. Domingues's card was brought to me while I was breakfasting, and I at once went to meet him. He was very excited and began by upbraiding the police for not looking after his property; then he became a little calmer and asked me to accompany him to his house.

Fortunately, nothing had been disturbed there, and we went at once to the dressing room, where we found Madame standing with a rueful face before the open safe. No doubt was possible; it was the work of an artist in the profession, a man with a sure hand, who had not wasted time over the business.

M. Domingues was eyeing me curiously.

"Well, M. Goron?" he said.

"This was not the work of a beginner," I replied.

"I am clever enough to see that, too," he remarked with a laugh. Then, after a pause:

"The thief must be found, M. Goron, do you understand? He must be found. Do not let expense stand in the way; I am prepared to put down at once any sum that may be required.

If M. Dominguez expected a reply he was disappointed, for I continued to make a careful investigation of the room in the hope of finding a clue.

"Was any one in charge of the upstairs rooms during the evening?" I asked Madame.

"Yes, one of the maids."

"Please send for her."

The maid came, looking very scared, Evidently she knew nothing, and I sent her about her business.

"Did you notice anything displaced or disturbed when you entered the dressing room this morning?" was my next question.

"No," retorted Madame, "no; or, rather, yes. This porcelain cup, and the ivory paper cutter, that are always on the safe, had been placed on that chair near the bed."

The thief, whoever he was, had handled these articles, and they now became objects of interest. The cup did not present any remarkable features, except that the thin coating of dust did not speak a well-regulated household. Then came the turn of the paper cutter, a large affair with an enormous monogram, and there, on the white ivory, was a small pinkish stain.

I felt convinced that the robbery had been committed by one of the guests, and inquired how many people they had entertained.

"One hundred and forty-two."

"Kindly give me the names."

Madame went to fetch the list, and handed it to me. I counted the names; there were sixty-three.

"Where are the others?"

Madame turned red, and then said:

"You see, M. Goron, we have not been long in Paris, and I gave my friends blank invitation cards, which they filled up and sent to people among their own set."

"Then you don't know even the names of the remaining seventy-nine who spent the evening with you?"

"Well, no; I remember perhaps half a dozen, but not the others."

Things did not look promising.

We entered the drawing room, which looked like a battlefield the day after the fight. Several of the small gilt chairs were broken, the china vases had been smashed, and there was a big tear in one of the pale yellow curtains.

When Domingues saw this devastation his temper, never the most equable, apparently, again got the better of him.

"Dios mio!" he shouted, "there's a night's entertainment; a fine expensive evening. Everything smashed; and three hundred thousand francs' worth of property stolen!" His eye wandered around the room till it rested on the piano, and he burst out afresh.

"Look at my Erard!" he gasped. I looked, and felt sorry both for the man and for the Erard. Punch, champagne, lemonade, every refreshment served had left a mark on the instrument, without reckoning the scratches and knocks, of which it bore numerous traces.

Why did I not follow M. Domingues when he walked to the door to conduct me to the dining room? Why did I sit down on the music stool before that ill-used piano? I cannot tell. All I know is that I gazed at the greasy, smudgy keys, and that suddenly I felt something like an electric shock. For, there, on one of the keys, in the higher notes, was a slight pinkish stain, similar to the one on the paper knife.

This scene had not lasted a minute, and I caught M. Domingues in the hall as he was turning back to see what had become of me.

"Still no clue, M. Goron?" asked the master of the house, looking at me from the corner of his eye.

"Still no clue," I retorted, "but I have a few questions to ask you. Who were the people who performed on the piano last night?"

Madame fumbled about some papers and handed me the program of the musical portion of the soiree. There was a pianist, a violinist, a prima-donna from the Opera Comique, and two Montmartre singers, all well-known artists.

"Now," I said; "I want to know who played after the concert, and whether you engaged a pianist for the dances."

"No, we had no professional. The dance was impromptu, and the gentlemen took turns at the piano."

"Can you give me the names of these gentlemen?"

"The names?" repeated Madame. "The names—let me think a moment. No, I only know one, M. de G——. He played a lot. The four others had come to the house for the first time, and I did not know them. Do you remember any, Enrique?"

I had no reason to be dissatisfied with my morning's work. The robbery, I felt certain, had been committed by one of the guests at the soiree.

The case was of too delicate a nature to instrust it to any of my subordinates. I myself had to forge the chain from the one link I hoped I possessed, and my first step was to send for M. de G——, whose address Madame Dominguez had given me.

M. de G——, who belonged to a very wealthy and highly esteemed family, replied promptly to my call. He had heard of the robbery, and I led the conversation on the Dominguezes.

"I do not know much about them," he said, laughingly; "they are new arrivals, and, I am told, very rich. Madame Dominguez was introduced to one of my aunts, and, as she was in want of young men, she sent me an invitation with the request to bring whom I liked. I never saw such a noisy gathering. Some of the men were really too bad."

"You worked very hard," I said, "and presided over the piano?"

"Well, not exactly. I did my share, but others, too, banged away as hard as I did."

"Who were the others?"

He grinned at me a moment.

"Do you, also, want to give a soiree, M. Goron? If so, don't engage any of that crowd, because they have no respect for pianos. But to tell you the truth, I only know one, a painter. I don't know where he lives, but he goes every night to Duval's, Place de la Madeleine."

"Will you do me the kindness to dine with me there this evening?" I asked.

"With pleasure," he retorted, and that same night we were in the well-known "Bouillon," waiting for the painter-pianist.

My young friend kept a careful watch, and eight o'clock had struck when he cried out:

"Hurrah! there he is. And—but that's really funny. You are in luck, M. Goron. Do you see the chap he is with? He, too, was one of the musical ornaments of the soiree."

Even before looking at the two young men I was convinced that neither of them was likely to be the burglar.

We waited till the two gentlemen had finished their dinner and put on their hats, when M. de G—— went up and introduced them to me, and I invited them to accompany me to a neighboring cafe. They were all deeply interested in the robbery, and during five minutes I patiently listened to their wit.

When my young friends had exhausted their wit, I turned the conversation in other channels. In reply to my question, the painter informed me that he knew another man who had obliged the company with dances at the Dominguez soiree, and, after a few more jokes about the interest I took in these amateur musicians, he promised to bring the other man to me the next morning.

Punctually at eleven the painter was ushered into my office, followed by a nineteen-year-old, fair-haired boy, the son of a rich widow, very nervous and awkward, who dropped his hat and stick a half dozen times in the space of five minutes. There was little of the expert burglar about him. Yes, he, too, had struck up two waltzes and a quadrille, but he had left early when he found it was getting a bit rowdy.

There remained, therefore, only one player, and if he was like those I had thus far seen, my theory, based on the two stains, fell to the ground. I requested the four to meet that afternoon in my office, and then asked them whether they could not remember who their fifth colleague was. They began by shaking their heads. And then the painter, decidedly the smartest among them, called out:

"Hold hard! There was a tall chap, rather military-looking."

"With an aquiline nose and black mustache," interrupted M. de G——.

"He played some pretty waltzes," piped the fair-haired youth.

None of them knew his name, but they—especially the painter—gave me his exact portrait. I thanked them, and returned to the Rue de Prony. The Dominguezes, husband and wife, vaguely remembered the tall man with the aquiline nose, but he was a stranger to them. I, therefore, gave Madame Domingues the man's minute description, and begged her to go to her friends to whom she had given blank invitations, and see whether she could obtain the desired information.

Unfortunately, it led to no result.

She had been to every house, and no one knew the man wanted.

A week passed. I had not made a step forward, and number five remained invisible.

I had gone to the fair in the Place du Trone to make an inquiry about a case in which I was interested. I was lighting my cigarette behind Madam Zaza's booth, when a whispering conversation between a woman and a man fell upon my ears, and I distinctly heard the words "Rue de Prony" and "Dominguez."

I did not hesitate a second. I ran round to the front, elbowed my way through the crowd, paid my fifty centimes at the desk, and, to the surprise of Madame Zaza, made straight for the little door opposite the entrance. I passed through, and saw a young woman in the fantastic dress of a sibyl. Her companion had disappeared. Despite her disguise, I recognized her, at once, as a girl who had played a part in an affair when the revolver had been used as a supreme argument.

I LOOKED AT THE MAN'S FACE, AND WAS GLAD I WAS GORDON AND NOT DOMINGUEZ

"Monsieur Goron!" she exclaimed.

"Yes, Lucie, it is I."

"What, what do you—"

"I want you to tell me what you know about the robbery in the Rue de Prony, and the name of the man who left you a minute ago."

She was too agitated to answer. I waited quietly and then she began convulsively:

"I know nothing about this affair. I swear it! Whatever my life has been, you know I am incapable of doing anything like—like that. And the man—the man I talked to, he is—he is—my friend."

"Tell me his name."

She wrung her hands and did not answer.

She reflected a moment, and, wiping her eyes, exclaimed:

"You are right. I am foolish. Things must take their course. His name is Charbonnel."

"I must see him at once," I insisted. "Where can I find him? And, be careful, don't try to trick me."

She shrugged her shoulders.

"Wait here; he will be back in half an hour."

I took a chair. She called out to Madame Zaza that she was engaged with Monsieur Goron, and sat down, staring vacantly at the wall opposite. Then, after a while, a man's voice from the back called, "Lucie!"

She turned toward me.

"There he is. See him yourself, but remember my words."

I went to the back, and there before me stood a tall man of about thirty-five, answering in every description to my missing number five. For a few seconds we looked at each other.

"M. Charbonnel?" I asked. He nodded.

"I am M. Goron, and you will oblige me by coming to my office. I want to speak to you."

He bowed assent.

I hailed a passing cab, and without having exchanged a word on the way, we arrived at the Prefecture.

The more I watched the man the more I felt impressed with his appearance. The grave eyes, the aquiline nose, the energetic mouth, betokened strength and will-power. I looked at his broad chest, at his hands, and then all of a sudden I experienced the same kind of shock I felt when I discovered the stains on Dominguez's piano, for on the tip of his right-hand middle finger I saw a small piece of sticking-plaster. No doubt was possible. The burglar sat there, within a yard of me.

I purposely kept my eyes fixed upon the bit of plaster, and involuntarily he followed my glance.

"It is a nasty spot to have cut," I began.

"Indeed it is." He smiled faintly.

"You must find it very awkward when you play the piano, like, for instance, at Monsieur and Madame Domingo's soiree."

He gave me a quick look and remained silent.

"You were there, were you not?"

"I was," he said, with a slight tremor in his voice.

"By whom were you introduced? Who took you there?"

"Nobody took me. I went there of my own accord."

"Without an invitation?"

"Without an invitation." He spoke like one in a trance.

"What was your object in going to the house?"

No answer, but I saw the perspiration break out on his brow.

"Perhaps you will tell me what you did upstairs in the dressing room?"

"Mercy!" he groaned, and buried his head in his hands.

He had risen from his chair, and the expression of anguish on his face was painful to watch.

"M. Goron," he exclaimed, "I know what is in your mind! But, as I stand before my Maker, I am innocent of any crime. If I went to that house, it was—it was to try to prevent a crime from being committed—and—now arrest me if you like."

"You say you are innocent. I will assume it. But I have the proof you were in the dressing room at the time the safe was broken open. You therefore know the burglar. Who is he?"

"I cannot tell you," he said huskily.

"You cannot?"

I knew full well that he would not yield to force. Moreover, despite the evidence against him, I felt in no way convinced of his guilt. If he intended to sacrifice himself for some one else, my detaining him would very likely prevent me from laying hands on the culprit. I therefore had him once more taken to the adjoining room, and sent for Inspector Despres, one of my smartest assistants.

"Despres," I said, "I am going with the gentleman in the next room to the hotel where he is staying. After a while I shall return, leaving him behind. But you watch him night and day, and report all his movements. If he attempts to leave Paris, bring him at once to me. Take all the assistance you require."

"I understand, sir," said Despres.

I drove with Charbonnel to the Hotel du Louvre, searched his luggage, looked through his papers, but without finding anything suspicious.

"No, you need not accompany me," I said: "all I ask you is not to leave Paris, and to come to me when I send for you. Goodby."

Before he had recovered from his surprise I was gone.

Two hours later one of my agents brought me the news that Charbonnel had gone to the postoffice in the Rue d'Amsterdam and inquired for letters addressed to "H. C.," whereupon I immediately communicated with the postoffice, asking them to detain all letters with these initials. Charbonnel, I then learned, called ocasionally on Lucie, but saw nobody else. On the fourth day two letters from Smyrna to "H. C." arrived at the Rue d'Amsterdam and were handed to me. Neither of them bore a signature.

In the first letter the writer simply announced his safe arrival in Smyrna; but the second told its own tale. "I was a fool," it said, "to have come to this hole. I should have stayed in Paris and chanced it, to watch that scoundrel. Twice he got the better of me; but this time I have him. My only regret is that you may possibly be molested. If so, it's your own fault. You ought to have left me alone. Please send me all cuttings relative to you know what."

I at once sent for Charbonnel. He looked haggard.

"I have good news for you," I cried; "your friend writes from Smyrna that he has safely arrived, and regrets exceedingly that you got yourself under suspicion. He is very sorry that he left Paris because he no longer can watch a certain scoundrel. Your friend has the kindness to give his address in Smyrna; that simplifies matters. I shall very likely start for Smyrna tonight, but I first wanted to see you, as perhaps you may have something to say to me."

Charbonnel looked at me, dumfounded.

"M. Goron, it is useless fighting against you. I vowed to do the right thing by my friend, but you have beaten me. Yes, it is he, Georges Ravel, who committed the burglary. I knew Georges fifteen years ago in Vera Cruz. I had fallen ill, I was penniless and, but for him, would have died like a dog. But he nursed me, advanced me money, and afterward got me a situation as hotel clerk.

"Since that moment things have gone well with me, and, thanks to a small legacy, I am now independant. But poor Georges later fell into bad ways. He gambled, drank and for five years I heard nothing of him. When I met him again I hardly recognized him. I fancy he was in prison somewhere in Venezuela, but he never spoke to me about his own affairs. All he told was that he had been cheated by a fellow called Dominguez, and that he meant to be even with him. He soon again disappeared, and I had to return to France to take possession of my legacy.

"A few months ago, to my consternation, he came to my hotel with the news that Dominguez was living in Paris, in the Rue de Prony, and that I would soon hear some surprising things. On the night before the soiree he came again, and, under the influence of drink, departed from his usual reticence. He said he intended to steal into the house and extract from the safe money, valuables, and the documents he hoped to find there.

"All attempts to hold him back proving fruitless, I resolved to go to the soiree, and, if possible, prevent mischief. He had grown a long beard, and it was not likely Dominguez would recognize him if he saw him. I don't know what possessed me to play, but just as I rose from the piano I caught sight of Georges in the hall. I saw him go upstairs, and rushed after him. I clutched his arm, but he knocked me down, and a bowl and some other articles on the safe fell off. In a twinkling he had wrenched open the lock, and, but for the terrific noise down-stairs, they must have heard it.

"I followed him like one in a dream, saw him put on his overcoat—for no servant was by—and disappear in the night. And now you know all. No, you know more than I do, for I am still trying to solve the mystery of how you tracked me to the dressing room when no one saw us—"

"Never mind that," I hurriedly replied. "I have other mysteries to solve now. Can you tell me anything more about Dominguez? Did the burglary really take place, and were valuables carried away?"

"I know nothing of Dominguez, except that Georges said he was a dangerous bandit. As to the burglary, I am sorry to say I was the unwilling witness of it. And now, M. Goron, you behave kindly to me. Allow me to give you some advice. Don't approach Dominguez until you have seen clear into the whole business."

That same night I was on my way to Smyrna. I arrived there late on a Sunday night, and went straight to the small hotel on the Mariana where Georges had given his address. The talkative waiter, a Belgian, informed me that there was a French gentleman staying there, a Dr. Picard, from Lyons.

"That's him coming in now," he said, pointing to a stout man, with deep-set, bile-shot eyes and an unsteady gait. I immediately recognized him from Charbonnel's description.

The following morning I called on the French consul and told him as much of the case as I considered necessary.

"Of course you know," he remarked, "that there is no extradition treaty between France and Turkey; yet, in virtue of my office, I can take upon myself to arrest a Frenchman, and, unless he makes too much fuss, secure you the necessary assistance to get him safely on board the steamer for Marseilles. One leaves tomorrow, so you had better look sharp."

At my request an official from the Consulate called about midday, when I knew my man was in; and, leaving him in the hall, I walked upstairs and knocked at the door.

"Good morning, M. Revel, I said, on entering. He rose from the easy chair in which he was sitting and glared at me.

"I am M. Goron," I continued, "and have come to take you back to Paris on the charge of having broken open a safe in M. Dominguez's house, and abstracted therefrom valuables of various kinds."

To my surprise, his morose expression disappeared, and in an almost cheerful tone he replied:

"I am glad to have you come. I am ready to go when you like. The sooner I can stand face to face with that hound and unmask him, the better. I know I shall have to pay a big penalty; but my revenge is cheap, even at the cost of heavy sentence."

"What hound?" I asked.

"Dominguez! Dominguez!" he shrieked. "Dominguez, the biggest villain unhung! He floored me twice, the cunning cur; but I have him here, under my thumb!"

I then called up the official from the Consulate, and in his presence carefully overhauled Ravel's belongings. At his own request I even searched his pockets, but discovered no trace of anything relative to the robbery. Fifty thousand francs in bank notes and gold he carried in a leather belt. In his hat box were a revolver and a tin of cartridges, of which I took possession.

"Give yourself no needless trouble, my dear Monsieur Goron," he laughed; "what you are looking for I left in Paris. There were other things in that safe besides trinkets and securities, of which only Dominguez and I know anything, and I did not care to carry them about me. They are in Paris," he shrieked at the top of his voice, "and will be produced when I am confronted with that hound. And then, Monsieur Goron, you will witness something which even you have never seen!"

He gave an uncanny chuckle, lit a cigarette and lapsed into silence.

A large cabin in the steamer leaving the next day for Marseilles had been reserved for us, and Ravel came on board with a jaunty air like a man bent on a pleasure trip. I had kept everything secret, but through some indiscretion the passengers knew who we were, and curious glances followed us when we set foot on deck.

We had still an hour to wait before lifting anchor. I therefore left Ravel in the cabin in charge of the official who was to accompany me to Marseilles, and went to ask a few questions of the captain. At that moment a telegraph boy came up shouting my name. I opened the wire. It was from the office. "Dominguez disappeared."

I tried to convince myself that the laconic official telegram meant that Dominguez had only absented himself for a while, but something told me that with his disappearance the principal link in that mystery had been severed.

However, I still had the opportunity of talking the matter over with my prisoner, and once under way, I asked him to give me some particulars about his connection with Dominguez.

"Wait till we get to Paris," he cried, and you will hear all you want to know—and more."

"But suppose Dominguez should have have left Paris?" I inquired.

He turned sharply around.

"What do you mean?"

I handed him the telegram and watched him curiously, for I expected him to fly into a violent rage. Instead of this he handed me the paper back, and quietly said:

"Have no fear, he will return!"

"You really don't mean that, Ravel?"

"I do mean it, I tell you."

Half an hour later I saw him in the cabin writing.

"I am already preparing my defense," he said with a sad smile.

I left him alone and went into the saloon where a lady was singing. It was a clear night, and the sea was as calm as a pool.

Then we heard a rush of feet on deck, the singer stopped, and in the stillness of the night rang the shout: "Man overboard!"

I felt as if a cold hand had grasped my throat. I ran to the cabin. It was empty. We looked everywhere for Ravel. He was gone.

The steamer at once stopped; two boats were lowered, but returned after half an hour's fruitless search. And we started again, all the passengers and men having been accounted for but Ravel.

For a couple of hours I paced the deck up and down, and then returned to my cabin, where not long ago I had seen my prisoner writing. On the table lay a letter in pencil addressed to me:

> "Dear M. Goron," it said: "fate is against me. Dominguez, the thief, who robs even his accomplices, is too clever for me—and you. I committed the burglary at Dominguez's house, not so much to take back what was rightly my share, as to secure a weapon wherewith I could smash him once for all. He has cleared out. He smelt a rat, M. Goron, and I do not want to be brought back as a common burglar, instead of an accuser. I have failed in this, like in everything else. Good-by.
>
> "G. RAVEL."

And thus, both the robber and the robbed disappeared. Nothing was heard of the stolen property. The mystery was never solved.

Shall I ever be able to efface the point of interrogation behind Dominguez's name?

Slowly, very slowly, the veil is lifted from this mystery.

I discovered that Ravel and Dominguez were implicated in a forgery case in Peru, when Dominguez dexterously succeeded in proving his innocence, while Ravel was sent to prison, but escaped. Three years later the two, always under different names, met again, and although no charge could be brought home to them, they were strongly suspected of being the authors of an important diamond robbery. Dominguez, however, cheated his confederate out of his share of the plunder, and hence the latter's craving for vengeance.

To my mind, Ravel's conclusions that we would never see Dominguez again were mistaken. He was evidently unhinged when he committed suicide. I feel convinced that Domingues will return to Paris, to try to recover the jewelry and documents abstracted from his safe and secreted by Ravel.

Tales of GOTHAM and other CITIES

Where Risk Is Greater Than That in Late Wars

NEW YORK.—Rear Admiral Robley D. Evans once said that he would sooner stand on the bridge of the battleship Ohio during a sea fight than cross Broadway. His view of the hazards of New York streets was not exaggerated, if you consider the fact that 423 people were killed and 2,004 injured by automobiles, street cars, and horse-drawn vehicles in the city last year. If statistics prove anything, it is safer to shoulder your rifle and go to a minor war than traverse the streets of the metropolis.

Just look back upon the records of the American regular army and see if this is not correct. Take the Indian wars from 1789 to 1812, a period of 23 years. Twenty officers and 726 men, a total of 746, were killed in those wars. That is less than twice the number of street victims in New York last year. The war of 1812 with Great Britain, lasting four years, took the lives of 65 American officers and 1,235 men. That was a hot contest, but the average number of casualties each year was considerably less than 423.

The war with Spain created plenty of excitement, but Spanish bullets and shells did not play the same amount of havoc with Americans as did the city's vehicles in 1911. Take, for instance, the fighting around Santiago from June 22 to July 17, 1898. This resulted in the death of 21 officers and 222 men attached to the Fifth army corps, while 101 officers and 1,344 were wounded.

These figures are illuminating, inasmuch as they show that the reckless and careless driver, be he chauffeur, motorman or whip, is already a menace to the city's peace and comfort. And, although he kills, he usually goes unpunished. He is free to kill again. The law rarely holds him accountable for his crime, and the family of the victim has no redress and receives no pension.

Woe for Messenger; "Cute Puppy" Was a Skunk

HUH
WHAT TH'— GIT OUT O'HERE !!

CHICAGO.—Jimmy Malbaum, special delivery messenger, has been banished in disgrace from the federal building. It isn't Jimmy's personality that's wrong—he is, or was, of a lovable and energetic disposition; it's something else.

Jimmy's exile dates from the time he went to the town of Jefferson with a special delivery letter. Tripping merrily along, Jimmy's eyes fell on a cute little black and white puppy crouched on the sidewalk. Across Jimmy's mind flashed the idea that he would corral that "pup" in his mail bag and take it home. He took after the animal.

The chase finally wound up in a nearby thicket. Jimmy gave up after a full five minutes' endeavor. Disappointed, he went back to the car line. A car happened along, and Jimmy boarded:

The conductor clanged the bell for a start and then clanged still harder for a stop.

"Hi, you'll have to get on the front platform," he yelled to Jimmy. Jimmy went.

The motorman took one whiff and then stopped the car.

"Say, kid, if youse wants to ride on this boat board the fender. I can't stand the gaff," the knight of the controller shouted.

"Say, take this bundle out," a mail clerk told Jimmy as soon as he landed.

As luck happened, the bundle of specials was for the hotel run. The first stop was the Palmer house. Jimmy had hardly landed when the head clerk rushed for a telephone and called up the postoffice.

"Say, do you want to drive all our patrons out?" he yelled through the transmitter. "This kid is awful."

That finished Jimmy. Another delivery boy met him on the corner outside the building and relieved him of his letters.

In explanation it might be said—and reliably—that the "puppy" Jimmy tried to catch was of the genus spilogale—otherwise a skunk.

Excited Woman Reports a Fierce Accident

HE MUST BE DEAD —I'LL TELEPHONE TO THE POLICE

BUFFALO, N. Y.—The presence of a large crowd about an automobile at Main and Carlton streets at 5:30 o'clock the other afternoon was telephoned to police station No. 3 by a woman.

"It must have been a fierce accident," said she. "There's a man under the car and he looks to be dead."

Her description aroused Desk Sergeant Healy.

"There's a man killed at Main and Carlton streets," said Healy, "and get there as quick as your mortal legs or a street car will take you."

The two policemen got a street car at Main and Chippewa streets, it being the quickest means of locomotion that is furnished in the third precinct.

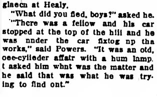
"It's a tough world," remarked Healy to Pike. "I suppose that man was going home to his supper or dinner, whichever he called it."

Powers and Winters returned to the station house after the lapse of about thirty minutes. They were passing on to the reserve room without even a glance at Healy.

"What did you find, boys?" asked he.

"There was a fellow and his car stopped at the top of the hill and he was under the car fixing up the works," said Powers. "It was an old, one-cylinder affair with a bum lamp. I asked him what was the matter and he said that was what he was trying to find out."

Errand Kills Horse and Gets Driver in Fight



CLEVELAND, O.—Adolph Gahlesteen, boarder at the home of Joseph Sechmopzer, Main and Center avenues, is positively convinced "he's the guy that put the tune in misfortune." Happy Hooligan in his palmiest days lived in a shower of dollar bills and turkey suppers compared to the luck he had yesterday, Gahlesteen maintains.

Gahlesteen borrowed a horse from Sechmopzer and hired a wagon from the West Side Transfer company. He drove to Parma to bring a trunk and two suitcases into Cleveland. On his way home to Parma the horse fell exhausted at Fulton road and Clarke avenue. In falling the animal broke both shafts of the wagon.

Gahlesteen telephoned the transfer company to send a rig to get his trunk and cases and another to take the wagon to the barn.

When the transfer driver started to take the rig away and left the horse lying in the street a general discussion among onlookers started, and it ended in a free-for-all fight. Gahlesteen fled. Patrolman Donnellan, of the West 25th street station, restored quiet.

At 11 o'clock that night Gahlesteen put in an appearance at Sechmopzer's home. After explanations he figured out what it cost, besides the trouble he got into, to move a trunk and two suitcases from Parma.

CHARLES S. WHITMAN WARMLY PRAISED

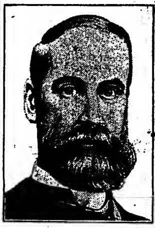
Warmest praise from the bench, bar and forum have recently been showered upon Charles S. Whitman, district attorney of New York city, as a tribute to his victory over the alliance of police power and gambling in the conviction of Charles Becker.

"The most notable victory of law and order in our generation in New York," were the words of a telegram to Mr. Whitman from a famous American author, and they were the keynote of the great heap of telegrams of congratulation which kept his desk covered for several days.

They were echoed in the words of the thousand others—physicians, clergymen, merchants, bankers and professional men, some who knew him only by sight, who rushed up to grip his hand and tell him how they valued what he had done to stamp graft into the earth and ring the doom of lawlessness and band violence. Some of them told him that they had prayed for him and righteousness in his glorious undertakings.

Their pious thanksgiving was one extreme of the result of Becker's conviction which spread through the whole city, touching every walk of life. In the haunts of crime the effect was most notable.

RECTOR SAYS $1,000 IS NOT ENOUGH



Clergymen in all parts of the country are busily engaged in discussing the action of Rev. Gilbert A. Shaw, who resigned from the rectorship of Grace Episcopal church of Riverside, L. I., because "a minister at the present time cannot live and maintain his honor on a salary of $1,000 a year." Rev. Mr. Shaw, therefore, is going to accept a call to church at Hazleton, Pa., where he will receive a larger salary.

"Rev. Mr. Shaw made a very rash assertion when he said that a minister of today could not live honorably on $1,000 a year," said Rev. Arthur H. Judge, rector of St. Matthew's Episcopal church of New York city, "though, of course, whether or not a minister could live 'honorably' upon that salary depends entirely upon circumstances. The cost of living for a minister, as for anyone else, depends upon whether he is married or single, and whether or not he lives in a great city or within the zone of high prices that always surround a big city. If Riverhead, L. I., is far enough away from New York not to be affected by metropolitan prices and if Rev. Mr. Shaw has his rectory furnished rent free (like most Episcopal ministers) then he ought to live very decently upon his salary, whether he is married or not.

"There is a common impression that clergymen are underpaid as a whole, but I think that all in all they are paid as well as the members of most of the professions or vocations."

MEHMED V. IS A MOST KINDLY MONARCH

With his empire apparently tottering about his ears and his entourage preparing to flee across the Bosporus to escape the vengeance of Bulgarian swords, it is interesting to note the personality of Sultan Mehmed V, who will likely go down into history as the last Turkish monarch to reign in Europe.

Probably no more kindly monarch exists anywhere in Europe, none who thinks more of his subjects' welfare and less of himself. The sultan is remembered by those who have met him by his benign smile, with which he favors all, from the highest to the lowest. He has a melancholy, meditative face, but those who attend him hear no harsh words, shrink from no sullen commands, as did those who attended his predecessors.

The sultan rises soon after dawn, and when his attendants bring him the habitual cup of delicious Arabian mocha he smiles to them and whispers: "Allah be praised for his gifts."

His bearing is at all times affable.

NAZIM PASHA, TURKEY'S GENERALISSIMO

At the outbreak of the Turko-Balkan war there was some uncertainty as to the precise commands of the various Turkish generals. The chief command of the Ottoman forces in Europe was assumed by Nazim Pasha, the minister of war. He received his early training at St. Cyr, the famous French military school. He is now sixty-four years old, but full of vigor and considered an able soldier. Ali Riza Pasha, according to the best sources of information, was made commander of the Turkish western army. He was trained in the German school. Mahmud Shevket Pasha was put in command of the Turkish forces operating against Servia.

Nazim Pasha was spoken of as "the Turkish Kitchener." He was one of the most brilliant pupils at St. Cyr. From time to time he has visited France, and on more than one occasion was an interested spectator of the grand autumn maneuvers. He has often expressed his gratitude for the teaching he received at the great French school, and, indeed, attributes to it the high rank to which he was advanced.

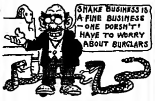
Odd Callings Are Found in Uncle Sam's Census



SNAKE BUSINESS IS A FINE BUSINESS —ONE DOESN'T HAVE TO WORRY ABOUT BURGLARS

WASHINGTON.—Oftentimes a man doesn't do as well at his own occupation as he ought to—thinks he has made a misfit and believes he can better himself. Here are a few suggestions for anyone thus dissatisfied from the thirteenth United States census:

There is a snake merchant who has a ranch out in Texas and has for more than seven years made a business of handling snakes. In one year he sold over 150,000 rattlers and blacksnakes, getting from a quarter to two dollars each.

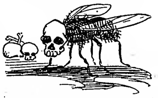
Formerly all the parts of a shoe were made by a shoemaker; today this industry employs judges, fakirs, plowers, sluggers, busters-out, cripple chasers and pancake-makers—all engaged one way or another in the making of shoes or parts of them.

Another man seems to be in a class by himself. In Kansas City he bottles the smoke of hickory logs. He says that when it is let loose in an air-tight compartment where meat has been hung it will produce the same results as though the meat had been cured in an old-fashioned smokehouse.

There is a man out Seattle way whose business it is to secure the mustaches from walrus killed in Bering Strait. These stout bristles are plucked from the nose of the walrus by Indians, tied into small bundles and sold by the Seattle citizen (who made $1,000 by this traffic in 1911) to agents on the Pacific coast. The agents ship them to China, where they are in demand as toothpicks. In an aged bull walrus the bristles are about a foot long and nearly as thick as a lead pencil. They are tough, and when made into picks can be pushed between the teeth without injury to the enamel.

Then there are also the whittler and the pouncer in a hat factory; a dock walloper is a kind of longshoreman; a vibrator works in a clock factory; a tonger works in connection with oysters; a teaser works in a glass factory.

Tests Confirm Danger of Common Stable Flies



SURGEON JOHN F. ANDERSON and Past Assistant Surgeon Wade H. Frost of the United States public health service have completed experiments which confirm the contention of Dr. Milton J. Rosenau of the Harvard Medical school, that infantile paralysis is communicated by the stable fly.

At the International Congress of Hygiene and Demography here recently Dr. Rosenau described his experiments. He infected several monkeys with infantile paralysis, and exposed them daily from the time of inoculation till death to the bites of several hundred stable flies.

Twelve other monkeys were then exposed to the bites of these flies. At the time that Dr. Rosenau made his announcement six of the twelve had developed symptoms characteristic of infantile paralysis. Of the six, two died, three were paralyzed and one recovered. In the cord of one of the monkeys were found the characteristic lesion of infantile paralysis. The cord of the other dead monkey showed changes less characteristic of the disease. At the time of the announcement a sufficient interval had not elapsed to determine the result of the attempt to transmit the infection of other monkeys by inoculation with the cord of one of the two that had died.

Dr. Anderson and Dr. Frost sought to repeat the conditions of Dr. Rosenau's experiments.

Their report made public the other day states that on October 3 monkey No. 242 was inoculated with an emulsion of the cord of the monkey which died of infantile paralysis. Until its death from the disease on October 8, the animal was exposed for two hours daily to the bites of 300 stable flies, collected in Washington. Another monkey similarly inoculated on October 5 was, beginning October 7, exposed daily to the bites of the same flies.

Beginning October 4 two other monkeys were exposed daily for about two hours to the bites of these same flies, and, beginning October 5, a third new monkey was similarly exposed. All three subsequently developed symptoms of infantile paralysis.

Fair Sex Drinks More Than Men in the Capital

BROTHER JOE THINKS IT AWFUL THAT I DRINK

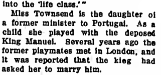
WOMEN, especially young girls, are rapidly becoming more and more addicted to intoxicating liquor in the national capital, while the men are rapidly growing more abstemious, according to Albert E. Shoemaker, attorney for the Anti-Saloon league of the District of Columbia. His accusation has aroused women generally here, and it is a subject of agitated discussion.

Mr. Shoemaker made his charge before the Women's Christian Temperance union, attributing the increasing thirst among women to the heavy competition among proprietors of handsomely furnished cafes and their willingness to "take a chance" in permitting women and young girls to drink.

Insanity seizes upon the bachelor with greater ease than upon the benedict, despite the worry the latter is supposed to undergo, according to the report of the government hospital for the insane.

A significant feature of the report lies in the statement that there are a far greater proportion of foreign insane patients than American.

Capital Society Girls Abandon Sports for Art



A GROUP of Washington society girls have forsaken outdoor sports for the fine arts. In previous years most of the members of the smart set could be found almost any morning taking a "beauty ride" in the parks or on the speedway.

Three mornings each week the daughters of cabinet ministers, soldiers and diplomats may be found leaning over easels, with brushes, studying oil painting under the tutelage of E. C. Messer, head of the art school of the Corcoran art gallery.

When Professor Messer was asked what progress the members of his class were making he replied that they were all showing some talent, although he did not seem to realize that there was anything unusual in the late additions to his class role.

"Miss Nagel, the daughter of a cabinet officer?" he asked. "Why, it never occurred to me to ask who her father is. Girls are just girls when they come to the school. But she is doing fine work. Miss Meyer and Miss Townsend are doing well also. Miss Townsend already has gone into the 'life class.'"

Miss Townsend is the daughter of a former minister to Portugal. As a child she played with the deposed King Manuel. Several years ago the former playmates met in London, and it was reported that the king had asked her to marry him.

Miss Hildegarde Nagel is the eldest daughter of the secretary of commerce and labor, and Miss Meyer is the daughter of the secretary of the navy. There are about a dozen altogether in the class who were recruited from Washington's smart set.

DISFIGURING THE LANDSCAPE.

An agricultural paper makes a strong protest against the too common practice in the rural districts of "disfiguring fences, barns and other buildings, trees, etc., with glaring signs." There might have been included in the list of great sprawling billboards which are to be seen along railways and highways at frequent intervals, says the Louisville Courier-Journal. A large amount of picturesque scenery is marred in this way. Nothing is sacred to the enterprising advertiser who is interested in keeping his wares before the public eye. It requires the consent of the property owners to disfigure buildings and beautiful landscapes in this way, but as some farmers and landowners find it to be a source of some small revenue, they are more than willing to permit the advertiser to work his will in such matters. But the farmer gets very little money out of the transaction, and only succeeds in detracting from the appearance of his property. There are many farmers who do not realize that there is a money value to them in keeping their farms and buildings in good order. A good beginning in that direction is by keeping the premises clear of things which are likely to be distasteful to passersby.

The use of the automobile has increased with great rapidity, and it has been inevitable that with the increase in use there would be an increase in the number of accidents, even though there should be, as a rule, an increase in the care exercised. Fatalities from horse-drawn vehicles have so long been a matter of course that they have attracted less attention than fatalities caused by automobiles, although until recently the number of the former has greatly exceeded the latter. In New York city thus far this year the fatalities recorded are 138, year the deaths caused by wagons number 117. Last year, in the same month, wagons caused the death of 111 persons, while automobiles killed only 79. It will thus be seen that the fatalities caused by automobiles in New York city have increased nearly 100 per cent., while the number chargeable to wagons was nearly stationary. These, however, are the figures for a densely populated city, and it is altogether probable that if the figures could be compiled for the entire country they would show that accidents to horse-drawn vehicles still outnumber those to automobiles, as was ascertained to be the case in England last year.

A young woman living near Syracusa has just died as the result of a "joke." Someone pulled a chair from under her while she was out in company, "there was a general laugh, in which she joined to hide her pain," and she died of peritonitis at a hospital four days afterward. Next July there will be a chance for some of her humorous friends to set a cannon cracker under somebody's chair, says the Buffalo Express. It is good to have minds that see the pleasant side of life in that way.

"There never can be any real and lasting peace in this country until world's championship baseball games have been eliminated from the sporting calendar," says the Chicago Tribune. The contemporary seems disposed to adopt the traditional method of pacification, namely: Creating a desert and calling it peace.

PEACE PLANS HALTED

TURKEY ORDERS WAR MINISTER NOT TO ACCEPT PROPOSALS.

Constantinople Dispatch Says Greece Has Concluded Peace With Ottoman Government.

Constantinople, Nov. 28.—It was reliably stated here on Tuesday on very good authority that Greece has concluded peace with Turkey. The main condition is stated to be the retention by Greece of Salonika. The minor terms are now being given their final shape.

A dispatch from Constantinople states that the peace negotiations are threatened with collapse owing to the demands of the allies for the surrender of Adrianople. It is also reported that Turkey, in counter proposals, has demanded that she be not compelled to pay a war indemnity; that she be allowed to retain the territory bounded by the Maritza river, including the fortress of Adrianople, and to maintain the sovereignty of the sultan in Albania.

Bulgaria, it is pointed out, probably will moderate her demands to some extent, but is is doubted that she will consent to the Turks retaining Adrianople.

The peace plenipotentiaries have agreed upon a commission to formally establish the existing positions of the two armies at Tchataljn and determine the lines of demarcation. This will greatly facilitate the program of the peace exchanges, it is believed here.

London, Nov. 29.—Durazzo, the Albanian Adriatic port, was occupied by Servian troops. The occupation was peaceful. The Austrian Lloyd steamer Graf Wurmbrand, which has been in the port of Durazzo for several weeks, left immediately crowded with refugees.

The effect of this move on the part of Servia will be watched with the greatest interest, Durazzo being the port which Servia wishes to retain and which Austria has announced must not be held by Servia.

STRIKERS NOT GUILTY

ETTOR, GIOVANNITTI AND CARUSO ACQUITTED FROM MURDER CHARGE.

ANOTHER TRIAL IS COMING

All Are Under Indictment for Offenses in Massachusetts, and Must Appear in Court Later—Jury Was Out Five Hours.

Salem, Mass., Nov. 28.—In the case of Joseph J. Ettor, Arturo Giovannitti and Joseph Caruso, on trial for the murder of Anna Lopizzo, who was killed in Lawrence textile strike riot last winter, the jury returned the verdict of "not guilty" Tuesday.

When the three men had heard the words freeing them from the charge they embraced and kissed each other.

The jury entered the courtroom at 7:20 o'clock. Immediately thereafter the prisoners, each wearing a red carnation, were brought to the cage in the center of the room. All were smiling. The defendants were commanded to stand and receive the verdict, which was the same in each case—"Not guilty."

The jury, which for more than six weeks had listened to the evidence in this notable trial, was then excused from further service, with the thanks of the court.

When the jurors had left, the court announced to Caruso that there was another indictment against him, charging him with assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill, and that the court would release him on his own recognizance.

When the prisoner had taken oath to appear in court when summoned he was released from the cage. His wife, waiting at the rail behind the prisoners' cage, fell into his arm, and a dozen of his male companions rushed forward and kissed him.

Ettor and Giovannitti also were held on another indictment charging them, together with William D. Haywood of the Industrial Workers of the World, and others, with conspiracy to incite riot in the Lawrence strike. On this they were released in bonds of $500 each, which were furnished by Helen S. Dudley of Boston.

The trial of Ettor, member of the executive committee of the Industrial Workers of the World; Giovannitti, a Socialist writer of Brooklyn, N. Y., and Caruso, a mill worker, came about in consequence of the strike of 30,000 operatives in the textile mills in Lawrence, Mass., suddenly precipitated January 12 last and continued for two months. Ettor and Giovannitti were accused as accessories before the fact to the murder of Anna Lopizzo, who was killed in a recent riot. The commonwealth maintained that they incited the riot in which the woman met her death by inflammatory speeches to the strikers

PLANS WERE FOILED

M'MANIGAL TELLS OF REIGN OF TERROR DEVISED.

Says James B. McNamara Wanted Panama Locks Blown—Plot to Wipe Out Los Angeles Told.

Indianapolis, Nov. 27.—Ortie E. McManigal related in the federal court here Monday stories of how the McNamaras, after the destruction of the Times, hatched the plots for more extensive violence and more desperate deeds than they had attempted before.

A plot to destroy the whole city of Los Angeles by explosion and fire, to make history on the coast date from the destruction of that city, instead of from the date of the San Francisco earthquake, was among those of which the dynamiter told.

In desperate desire to carry out this dynamiting program, if the executive board, as he feared it would, cut off the money supply, John J. McNamara was ready to resort to the "hold-up" or highway robbery to get money, said his former companion, in crime.

How J. J. McNamara sought to get McManigal to go to Panama to blow up the canal locks under construction by the McClintic-Marshall company, was another interesting episode in the conspiracy, as related by the dynamiter.

The conversation in which most of these plans were disclosed, said the dynamiter, occurred at the international headquarters in this city, April 7, 1911, only five days before J. B. McNamara and Ortie McManigal were arrested in Detroit.

ROLLS DOWN EMBANKMENT

Broken Rail Causes Tragedy on Cincinnati Express near Philadelphia—Passengers Thrown in Heap When Coaches Leave the Tracks.

Philadelphia, Nov. 30.—The Cincinnati express on the Pennsylvania railroad was derailed at Glenloch, twenty-five miles from this city, Thursday. Four persons were killed and fifty injured, some of them fatally, in crash.

The train, a double-header, was running at the rate of fifty miles an hour when the accident occurred. Derailed it is believed, by a broken rail, one day coach and three Pullmans, all of steel construction, rolled down an embankment, upon a string of coal cars standing at a lower level upon a parallel track.

The cars, with their human freight tossed about the seats, berths and corridors, were piled high on both sides of the coal cars, some of which were derailed and turned around by the force of the impact.

The dead: J. E. Collins, passenger, Buffalo, N. Y.

Howard E. Baldwin, Pullman conductor of Brooklyn, N. Y.

L. D. Finley, passenger, Pittsburg, Pa.

The train was composed of a combination baggage and smoker, one day coach and six Pullmans and was pulled by two heavy locomotives. The train was running along on scheduled time, which calls for an average of about thirty-eight miles per hour, when the accident occurred. The broken rail, which is thought to have caused the accident, was on a bridge east of Glenloch. Both locomotives and five cars jumped the track, bumped along the rails for a short distance and then rolled over and down the embankment into the string of coal cars. The steel cars of the passenger train stood the impact well, although the ends of several of them were crushed.

PATRICK LEAVES SING SING

New York, Nov. 30.—The barred door of Sing Sing swung open for Albert T. Patrick Thursday. At exactly 4:25 o'clock the lawyer, who for nearly eleven years was cooped up in the gray-walled prison, convicted of the murder of William Marsh Rice, his millionaire client, stepped out, a free man, pardoned by Governor Dix.

Accompanying the statement that he had granted a full pardon to Albert T. Patrick, Governor Dix said:

"There has always been an air of mystery in this important case. Quoting from a minority opinion the atmosphere shows that a fair and impartial trial was scarcely possible. I trust Mr. Patrick will devote his energies to a complete vindication of his asserted innocence. I have given this case considerable thought during the past year and I believe that Mr Patrick is entitled to a full pardon."

A DOCTOR'S SLEEP

Found He Had to Leave Off Coffee.

Many persons do not realize that a bad stomach will cause insomnia.

Coffee and tea drinking being such an ancient and respectable form of habit, few realize that the drug—caffeine—contained in coffee and tea, is one of the principal causes of dyspepsia and nervous troubles.

Without their usual portion of coffee or tea, the caffeine topers are nervous, irritable and fretful. That's the way with a whisky drinker. He has got to have his dram "to settle his nerves"—habit.

To leave off coffee or tea is an easy matter if you want to try it, because Postum gives a gentle but natural support to the nerves and does not contain any drug—nothing but food.

Physicians know this to be true, as one from Ga. writes:

"I have cured myself of a long-standing case of Nervous Dyspepsia by leaving off coffee and using Postum," says the doctor.

"I also enjoy refreshing sleep, to which I've been an utter stranger for 20 years.

"In treating dyspepsia in its various types, I find little trouble when I can induce patients to quit coffee and adopt Postum."

Postum now comes in concentrated, powder form called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste, and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

TAFT SENDS IN MESSAGE ABOUT FOREIGN AFFAIRS

President Informs Congress of Our Relations With Other Nations.

AMERICAN DIPLOMACY WINS

Its Success in Settling Central American Troubles.

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE BETTER

Reorganization Has Done Much to Increase Its Efficiency—Adjustment of the Sealing and Fisheries Disputes—Interests of United States in the Near and Far East.

Washington, Dec. 3.—President Taft submitted to congress today the first of several messages. It was devoted to our foreign relations and in part was as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives: The foreign relations of the United States actually and potentially affect the state of the Union to a degree not widely realized and hardly surpassed by any other factor in the welfare of the whole nation. The position of the United States in the moral, intellectual, and material relations of the family of nations should be a matter of vital interest to every patriotic citizen. The national prosperity and power impose upon us duties which we can not shirk if we are to be true to our ideals. The tremendous growth of the export trade of the United States has already made that trade a very real factor in the industrial and commercial prosperity of the country. With the development of our industries the foreign commerce of the United States must rapidly become a still more essential factor in its economic welfare. Whether we have a far-seeing and wise diplomacy and are not recklessly plunged into unnecessary wars, and whether our foreign policies are based upon an intelligent grasp of present-day world conditions and a clear view of the potentialities of the future, or are governed by a temporary and timid expediency or by narrow views befitting an infant nation, are questions in the alternative consideration of which must convince any thoughtful citizen that no department of national polity offers greater opportunity for promoting the interests of the whole people on the one hand, or greater chance on the other of permanent national injury, than that which deals with the foreign relations of the United States.

The fundamental foreign policies of the United States should be raised high above the conflict of partisanship and wholly dissociated from differences as to domestic policy. In its foreign affairs the United States should present to the world a united front. The intellectual, financial and industrial interests of the country and the publicist, the wage earner, the farmer, and citizen of whatever occupation must co-operate in a spirit of high patriotism to promote that national solidarity which is indispensable to national efficiency and to the attainment of national ideals.

The relations of the United States with all foreign powers remain upon a sound basis of peace, harmony and friendship. A greater insistence upon justice to American citizens or interests wherever it may have been denied and a stronger emphasis of the need of mutuality in commercial and other relations have only served to strengthen our friendships with foreign countries by placing those friendships upon a firm foundation of realities as well as aspirations.

Before briefly reviewing the more important events of the last year in our foreign relations, which it is my duty to do as charged with their conduct and because diplomatic affairs are not of a nature to make it appropriate that the secretary of state make a formal annual report, I desire to touch upon some of the essentials to the safe management of the foreign relations of the United States and to endeavor, also, to define clearly certain concrete policies which are the logical modern corrollaries of the undisputed and traditional fundamentals of the foreign policy of the United States.

Reorganization of the State Department.

At the beginning of the present administration the United States, having fully entered upon its position as a world power, with the responsibilities thrust upon it by the results of the Spanish-American war, and already engaged in laying the groundwork of a vast foreign trade upon which it should one day become more and more dependent, found itself without the machinery for giving thorough attention to, and taking effective action upon, a mass of intricate business vital to American interests in every country in the world.

The department of state was an archaic and inadequate machine lacking most of the attributes of the foreign office of any great modern power. With an appropriation made upon my recommendation by the congress on August 5, 1909, the department of state was completely reorganized. There were created divisions of Latin-American affairs and of far eastern, near eastern, and western European affairs. To these divisions were called from the foreign service diplomatic and consular officers possessing experience and knowledge gained by actual service in different parts of the world and thus familiar with political and commercial conditions in the regions concerned. The work was highly specialized. The result is that where previously this government from time to time would emphasize in its foreign relations one or another policy, now American interests in every quarter of the globe are being cultivated with equal assiduity.

Merit System in Consular and Diplomatic Corps.

Expert knowledge and professional training must evidently be the essence of this reorganization. Without a trained foreign service there would not be men available for the work in the reorganized department of state. President Cleveland had taken the first step toward introducing the merit system in the foreign service. That had been followed by the application of the merit principle, with excellent results, to the entire consular branch. Almost nothing, however, had been done in this direction with regard to the diplomatic service. In this age of commercial diplomacy it was evidently of the first importance to train an adequate personnel in that branch of the service. Therefore, on November 26, 1909, by an executive order I placed the diplomatic service up to the grade of secretary of embassy, inclusive, upon exactly the same strict non-partisan basis of the merit system, rigid examination for appointment and promotion only for efficiency, as had been maintained without exception in the consular service.

How faithful to the merit system and how nonpartisan has been the conduct of the diplomatic and consular services in the last four years may be judged from the following: Three ambassadors now serving held their present rank at the beginning of the administration. Of the ten ambassadors whom I have appointed, five were by promotion from the rank of minister. Nine ministers now serving held their present rank at the beginning of the administration. Of the thirty ministers whom I have appointed, eleven were promoted from the lower grades of the foreign service or from the department of state. Of the nineteen missions in Latin America, where our relations are close and our interest is great, fifteen chiefs of mission are service men, three having entered the service during this administration. The thirty-seven secretaries of embassy or legation who have received their initial appointments after passing successfully the required examination were chosen for ascertained fitness, without regard to political affiliations. A dearth of candidates from southern and western states has alone made it impossible thus far completely to equalize all the states' representations in the foreign service. In the effort to equalize the representation of the various states in the consular service I have made sixteen of the twenty-nine new appointments as consul which have occurred during my administration from the southern states. This is 55 per cent. Every other consular appointment made, including the promotion of eleven young men from the consular assistant and student interpreter corps, has been by promotion or transfer, based solely upon efficiency shown in the service.

In order to assure to the business and other interests of the United States a continuance of the resulting benefits of this reform, I earnestly renew my previous recommendations of legislation making it permanent along some such lines as those of the measure now pending in congress.

Larger Provision for Embassies and Legations and for Other Expenses of Our Foreign Representatives Recommended.

In connection with legislation for the amelioration of the foreign service, I wish to invite attention to the advisability of placing the salary appropriations upon a better basis. I believe that the best results would be obtained by a moderate scale of salaries, with adequate funds for the expenses of proper representation, based in each case upon the scale and cost of living at each post, controlled by a system of accounting, and under the general direction of the department of state.

In line with the object which I have sought of placing our foreign service on a basis of permanency, I have at various times advocated provision by congress for the acquisition of government-owned buildings for the residence and offices of our diplomatic officers, so as to place them more nearly on an equality with similar officers of other nations and to do away with the discrimination which otherwise must necessarily be made, in some cases, in favor of men having large private fortunes. The act of congress which I approved on February 17, 1911, was a right step in this direction. The secretary of state has already made the limited recommendations permitted by the act for any one year, and it is my hope that the bill introduced in the house of representatives to carry out these recommendations will be favorably acted on by the congress during its present session.

Diplomacy a Handmaid of Commercial Intercourse and Peace.

The diplomacy of the present administration has sought to respond to modern ideas of commercial intercourse. This policy has been characterized as substituting dollars for bullets. It is one that appeals alike to idealistic humanitarian sentiments, to the dictates of sound policy and strategy, and to legitimate commercial aims. It is an effort frankly directed to the increase of American trade upon the axiomatic principle that the government of the United States shall extend all proper support to every legitimate and beneficial American enterprise abroad. How great have been the results of this diplomacy, coupled with the maximum and minimum provision of the tariff law, will be seen by some consideration of the wonderful increase in the export trade of the United States. Because modern diplomacy is commercial, there has been a disposition in some quarters to attribute to it none but materialistic aims. How strikingly erroneous is such an impression may be seen from a study of the results by which the diplomacy of the United States can be judged.

Successful Efforts in Promotion of Peace.

In the field of work toward the ideals of peace this government negotiated, but to my regret was unable to consummate, two arbitration treaties which set the highest mark of the aspiration of nations toward the substitution of arbitration and reason for war in the settlement of international disputes. Through the efforts of American diplomacy several wars have been prevented or ended. I refer to the successful tripartite mediation of the Argentine republic, Brazil, and the United States between Peru and Ecuador; the bringing of the boundary dispute between Panama and Costa Rica to peaceful arbitration; the staying of warlike preparations when Hayti and the Dominican republic were on the verge of hostilities; the stopping of a war in Nicaragua; the halting of internecine strife in Honduras. The government of the United States was thanked for its influence toward the restoration of amicable relations between the Argentine republic and Bolivia. The diplomacy of the United States is active in seeking to assuage the remaining ill-feeling between this country and the Republic of Colombia. In the recent civil war in China the United States successfully joined with the other interested powers in urging an early cessation of hostilities. An agreement has been reached between the governments of Chile and Peru whereby the celebrated Tacna-Arica dispute, which has so long embittered international relations on the west coast of South America, has at last been adjusted. Simultaneously came the news that the boundary dispute between Peru and Ecuador had entered upon a stage of amicable settlement. The position of the United States in reference to the Tacna-Arica dispute between Chile and Peru has been one of nonintervention, but one of friendly influence and pacific counsel throughout the period during which the dispute in question has been the subject of interchange of views between this government and the two governments immediately concerned. In the general easing of international tension on the west coast of South America the tripartite mediation, to which I have referred, has been a most potent and beneficent factor.

China.

In China the policy of encouraging financial investment to enable that country to help itself has had the result of giving new life and practical application to the open-door policy. The consistent purpose of the present administration has been to encourage the use of American capital in the development of China by the promotion of those essential reforms to which China is pledged by treaties with the United States and other powers. The hypothecation to foreign bankers in connection with certain industrial enterprises, such as the Hukuang railways, of the national revenues upon which these reforms depended, led the department of state early in the administration to demand for American citizens participation in such enterprises, in order that the United States might have equal rights and an equal voice in all questions pertaining to the disposition of the public revenues concerned. The same policy of promoting international accord among the powers having similar treaty rights as ourselves in the matters of reform, which could not be put into practical effect without the common consent of all, was likewise adopted in the case of the loan desired by China for the reform of its currency. The principle of international co-operation in matters of common interest upon which our policy had already been based in all of the above instances has admittedly been a great factor in that concert of the powers which has been so happily conspicuous during the perilous period of transition through which the great Chinese nation has been passing.

Central America Needs Our Help in Debt Adjustment.

In Central America the aim has been to help such countries as Nicaragua and Honduras to help themselves. They are the immediate beneficiaries. The national benefit to the United States is two-fold. First, it is obvious that the Monroe doctrine is more vital in the neighborhood of the Panama canal and the zone of the Caribbean than anywhere else. There, too, the maintenance of that doctrine falls most heavily upon the United States. It is therefore essential that the countries within that sphere shall be removed from the jeopardy involved by heavy foreign debt and chaotic national finances and from the ever-present danger of international complications due to disorder at home. Hence the United States has been glad to encourage and support American bankers who were willing to lend a helping hand to the financial rehabilitation of such countries because this financial rehabilitation and the protection of their custom houses from being the prey of would-be dictators would remove at one stroke the menace of foreign creditors and the menace of revolutionary disorder.

The second advantage to the United States is one affecting chiefly all the southern and gulf ports and the business and industry of the south. The republics of Central America and the Caribbean possess great natural wealth. They need only a measure of stability and the means of financial regeneration to enter upon an era of peace and prosperity, bringing profit and happiness to themselves and at the same time creating conditions sure to lead to a flourishing interchange of trade with this country.

I wish to call your especial attention to the recent occurrences in Nicaragua, for I believe the terrible events recorded there during the revolution of the past summer—the useless loss of life, the devastation of property, the bombardment of defenseless cities, the killing and wounding of women and children, the torturing of noncombatants to exact contributions, and the suffering of thousands of human beings—might have been averted had the department of state, through approval of the loan convention by the senate, been permitted to carry out its now well-developed policy of encouraging the extending of financial aid to weak Central American states with the primary objects of avoiding just such revolutions by assisting those republics to rehabilitate their finances, to establish their currency on a stable basis, to remove the custom houses from the danger of revolutions by arranging for their secure administration, and to establish reliable banks.

During this last revolution in Nicaragua, the government of that republic having admitted its inability to protect American life and property against acts of sheer lawlessness on the part of the malcontents, and having requested this government to assume that office, it became necessary to land over 2,000 marines and bluejackets in Nicaragua. Owing to their presence the constituted government of Nicaragua was free to devote its attention wholly to its internal troubles, and was thus enabled to stamp out the rebellion in a short space of time. When the Red Cross supplies sent to Granada had been exhausted, 8,000 persons having been given food in one day upon the arrival of the American forces, our men supplied other unfortunate, needy Nicaraguans from their own haversacks. I wish to congratulate the officers and men of the United States navy and marine corps who took part in re-establishing order in Nicaragua upon their splendid conduct, and to record with sorrow the death of seven American marines and bluejackets. Since the re-establishment of peace and order, elections have been held amid conditions of quiet and tranquility. Nearly all the American marines have now been withdrawn. The country should soon be on the road to recovery. The only apparent danger now threatening Nicaragua arises from the shortage of funds. Although American bankers have already rendered assistance, they may naturally be loath to advance a loan adequate to set the country upon its feet without the support of some such convention as that of June, 1911, upon which the senate has not yet acted.

The president alluded briefly to the enforcement of neutrality laws, to Secretary Knox's visit to Central America and to the unfortunate disturbances in Mexico. Continuing, the message said:

Agricultural Credits.

A most important work, accomplished in the past year by the American diplomatic officers in Europe, is the investigation of the agricultural credit system in the European countries. Both as a means to afford relief to the consumers of this country through a more thorough development of agricultural resources and as a means of more sufficiently maintaining the agricultural population, the project to establish credit facilities for the farmers is a concern of vital importance to this nation. No evidence of prosperity among well-established farmers should blind us to the fact that lack of capital is preventing a development of the nation's agricultural resources and an adequate increase of the land under cultivation; that agricultural production is fast falling behind the increase in population; and that, in fact, although these well-established farmers are maintained in increasing prosperity because of the natural increase in population, we are not developing the industry of agriculture. We are not breeding in proportionate numbers a race of independent and independence-loving land owners, for a lack of which no growth of cities can compensate. Our farmers have been our mainstay in times of crisis, and in future it must still largely be upon their stability and common sense that this democracy must rely to conserve its principles of self-government.

The need of capital which American farmers feel today had been experienced by the farmers of Europe, with ago. The problem had been success- their centuries-old farms, many years fully solved in the old world and it was evident that the farmers of this country might profit by a study of their systems. I therefore ordered, through the department of state, an investigation to be made by the diplomatic officers in Europe, and I have laid the results of this investigation before the governors of the various states with the hope that they will be used to advantage in their forthcoming meeting.

Increase of Foreign Trade.

In my last annual message I said that the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, was noteworthy as marking the highest record of exports of American products to foreign countries. The fiscal year 1912 shows that this rate of advance has been maintained, the total domestic exports having a valuation approximately of $2,200,000,000, as compared with a fraction over $2,000,000,000 the previous year. It is also significant that manufactured and partly manufactured articles continue to be the chief commodities forming the volume of our augmented exports, the demands of our own people for consumption requiring that an increasing proportion of our abundant agricultural products be kept at home. In the fiscal year 1911 the exports of articles in the various stages of manufacture, not including foodstuffs partly or wholly manufactured, amounted approximately to $907,500,000. In the fiscal year 1912 the total was nearly $1,022,000,000, a gain of $114,000,000.

Advantage of Maximum and Minimum Tariff Provision.

The importance which our manufactures have assumed in the commerce of the world in competition with the manufactures of other countries again draws attention to the duty of this government to use its utmost endeavors to secure impartial treatment for American products in all markets. Healthy commercial rivalry in international intercourse is best assured by the possession of proper means for protecting and promoting our foreign trade. It is natural that competitive countries should view with some concern this steady expansion of our commerce. If in some instances the measures taken by them to meet it are not entirely equitable, a remedy should be found. In former messages I have described the negotiations of the department of state with foreign governments for the adjustment of the maximum and minimum tariff as provided in section 2 of the tariff law of 1909. The advantages secured by the adjustment of our trade relations under this law have continued during the last year, and some additional cases of discriminatory treatment of which we had reason to complain have been removed. The department of state has for the first time in the history of this country obtained substantial most-favored-nation treatment from all the countries of the world. There are, however, other instances which, while apparently not constituting undue discrimination in the sense of section 2, are nevertheless exceptions to the complete equity of tariff treatment for American products that the department of state consistently has sought to obtain for American commerce abroad.

Necessity for Supplementary Legislation.

These developments confirm the opinion conveyed to you in my annual message of 1911, that while the maximum and minimum provision of the tariff law of 1909 has been fully justified by the success achieved in removing previously existing undue discriminations against American products, yet experience has shown that this feature of the law should be amended in such way as to prevent a fully effective means of meeting the varying degrees of discriminatory treatment of American commerce in foreign countries still encountered, as well as to protect against injurious treatment on the part of foreign governments, through either legislative or administrative measures, the financial interests abroad of American citizens whose enterprises enlarge the market for American commodities.

I can not too strongly recommend to congress the passage of some such enabling measure as the bill which was recommended by the secretary of state in his letter of December 13, 1911. The object of the proposed legislation is, in brief, to enable the executive to apply, as the case may require, to any or all commodities, whether or not on the free list from a country which discriminates against the United States, a graduated scale of duties up to the maximum of 25 per cent. ad valorem provided in the present law. Flat tariffs are out of date.

Special Claims Arbitration With Great Britain.

The special agreement entered into between the United States and Great Britain on August 18, 1910, for the arbitration of outstanding pecuniary claims, a schedule of claims and the terms of submission have been agreed upon by the two governments, and together with the special agreement were approved by the senate on July 19, 1911, but in accordance with the terms of the agreement they did not go into effect until confirmed by the two governments by an exchange of notes, which was done on April 26 inst. Negotiations are still in progress for a supplemental schedule of claims to be submitted to arbitration under this agreement, and meanwhile the necessary preparations for the arbitration of the claims included in the first schedule have been undertaken and are being carried on under the authority of an appropriation made for that purpose at the last session of congress. It is anticipated that the two governments will be prepared to call upon the arbitration tribunal, established under this agreement, to meet at Washington early next year to proceed with this arbitration.

Fur Seal Treaty and Need for Amendment of Our Statute.

The act adopted at the last session of Congress to give effect to the fur-seal convention of July 1, 1911, between Great Britain, Japan, Russia and the United States, provided for the suspension of all land killing of seals on the Pribilof islands for a period of five years, and an objection has now been presented to this provision by the other parties in interest, which raises the issue as to whether or not this prohibition of land killing is inconsistent with the spirit, if not the letter, of the treaty stipulations. The justification for establishing this close season depends, under the terms of the convention, upon how far, if at all, it is necessary for protecting and preserving the American fur-seal herd and for increasing its number. This is a question requiring examination of the present condition of the herd and the treatment which it needs in the light of actual experience and scientific investigation. A careful examination of the subject is now being made, and the government will soon be in possession of a considerable amount of new information about the American seal herd, which has been secured during the past season and will be of great value in determining this question; and if it should appear that there is any uncertainty as to the real necessity for imposing a close season at this time, I shall take an early opportunity to address a special message to congress on this subject, in the belief that this government should yield on this point rather than give the slightest ground for the charge that we have been in any way remiss in observing our treaty obligations.

Final Settlement of North Atlantic Fisheries Dispute.

On the 20th of July last an agreement was concluded between the United States and Great Britain adopting, with certain modifications, the rules and method of procedure recommended in the award rendered by the North Atlantic Coast Fisheries Arbitration Tribunal on September 7, 1910, for the settlement hereafter, in accordance with the principles laid down in the award, of questions arising with reference to the exercise of the American fishing liberties under Article I of the treaty of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain. This agreement received the approval of the senate on August 1 and was formally ratified by the two governments on November 15 last. The rules and a method of procedure embodied in the award provided for determining by an impartial tribunal the reasonableness of any new fishery regulations on the treaty coasts of Newfoundland and Canada before such regulations could be enforced against American fishermen exercising their treaty liberties on those coasts, and also for determining the delimitation of bays on such coasts more than 10 miles wide, in accordance with the definition adopted by the tribunal of the meaning of the word "bays" as used in the treaty.

Imperial Valley and Mexico.

In order to make possible the more effective performance of the work necessary for the confinement in their present channel of the waters of the lower Colorado river, and thus to protect the people of the Imperial Valley, as well as in order to reach with the government of Mexico an understanding regarding the distribution of the waters of the Colorado river, in which both governments are much interested, negotiations are going forward with a view to the establishment of a preliminary Colorado river commission, which shall have the powers necessary to enable it to do the needful work and with authority to study the question of the equitable distribution of the waters. There is every reason to believe that an understanding upon this point will be reached and that an agreement will be signed in the near future.

The message told what the government has done in connection with the Balkan war and in placing the government of Liberia in position to pay its debts. The new condition of affairs in China was set forth, and then our relations with Central and South American governments were set forth in more detail. It concluded as follows:

Congress should fully realize the conditions which obtain in the world as we find ourselves at the threshold of our middle age as a nation. We have emerged full grown as a peer in the great concourse of nations. We have passed through various formative periods. We have been self-centered in the struggle to develop our domestic resources and deal with our domestic questions. The nation is now too mature to continue in its foreign relations those temporary expedients natural to a people to whom domestic affairs are the sole concern. In the past our diplomacy has often consisted, in normal times, in a mere assertion of the right to international existence. We are now in a larger relation with broader rights of our own and obligations to others than ourselves. A number of great guiding principles were laid down early in the history of this government. The recent task of our diplomacy has been to adjust those principles to the conditions of today, to develop their corollaries, to find practical applications of the old principles expanded to meet new situations. Thus are being evolved bases upon which can rest the superstructure of policies which must grow with the destined progress of this nation. The successful conduct of our foreign relations demands a broad and a modern view. We can not meet new questions nor build for the future if we confine ourselves to outworn dogmas of the past and to the perspective appropriate at our emergence from colonial times and conditions. The opening of the Panama canal will mark a new era in our international life and create new and world-wide conditions which, with their vast correlations and consequences, will obtain for hundreds of years to come. We must not wait for events to overtake us unawares. With continuity of purpose we must deal with the problems of our external relations by a diplomacy modern, resourceful, magnanimous, and fittingly expressive of the high ideals of a great nation.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1906, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

Barley and oats will be one of the largest crops sown on spring plowing, although the price of barley is likely to be low next year as during hard times the people do not drink much beer.

Any politician that is looking for something easy to "work," we respectfully refer him to the town of Mayfield, Town 152 N. Range 41, but don't try it on Kratka, Wyndott, or Highlanding.

The pleasant weather of the past month has helped to make up some of the loss of our September snow storm but the fall plowing is what is lacking, and will put the farmers way behind with their springs work.

Grain is steadily going downward but the millers have not discoverd it yet, so as to reduce the price of flour, as their news always comes by slow freight. If the price of wheat goes down, but if it rises in price they get their news by special telegram

The Thief River Falls News Press, certainly wanted to have a good stand in with all the prospective County Commissioners from the 5th district as they first supported Mandt, and in their last weeks issue wheeled around and supported Larson, which of course was for Larson, Leimers and Co., and any other sore head that wanted to see Mand defeated. A newspaper of that stamp has about as much political pull as the barking of an Indian dog, as the peoare "dead next" to moves of that kind.

That married man Bailey, from Thief River Falls who induced a 17 year old girl, from Hill City to elope with him, will have a couple of years making twine at Stillwater ahead of him. The girl claims that she is 18 years old, and above the age of consent, but Papa's register says that she is only 17, and that is what goes in the courts of of this state. When the gentleman gets through serving his sentence, if he takes a notion to run away with another girl, he will doubtless look up the family record to see if she is over 18 and her own boss.

Last Tuesdays Special Election in the 5th commissioner District closes down politics for this year. and we for one are glad of it. If there is any one individual that gets the slippery end of the stick in a political campaign it is the publisher of a weekly newspaper. If you have an opinion and express it the man who is likely to loose votes by it will say that you have sold out, and the one you favor will hint that he was sure to win out anyhow and that he don't think what the newspapers said cut much ice. That is he says that after Election, while the man you did not support swears he will get even with you for selling him out. And there you are.

Of course to the victor belongs the spoils. But in divideing up the bones it might be well to consider the under dog in the fight, who by his snapping at the heels of that big mastiff, the republican party, made it possiable for the democrats to win. Be careful my democratic friend of making any changes in the Department of the Interior, as the present service is very satisfactor to the people, the ones that vote. But if you clean out [illegible] Engineers "outfit" at St. Paul, the people will arise and call you blessed.

Drives Off A Terorr.

The chief executioner of death in the winter and spring months is pneumonia. Its advance agents are colds and grip. In any attack by one of these maladies no time should be lost in taking the best medicine obtainable to drive it off. Countless thousands have found this to be Dr. King's New Discovery." My husband believes it has kept him from having pneumonia three or four times," writes Mrs. George W. Place, Rawsonville, Vt., "and for coughs, colds and croup we have never found its equal."Guaranteed for all bronchial affections. Price 50 cts. and $1.00. Trial bottle free at All Druggists.

The First Fiction.

The "Tale of Two Brothers," written 3,200 years ago by the Theban scribe. Ennana, librarian of the palace to King Merenptah, the supposed Pharaoh of the Exodus, is the oldest work of fiction extant. The tale was written apparently for the entertainment of the crown prince, who subsequently reigned as Seti II. His name appears in two pieces on the manuscript—probably the only surviving autograph signatures of an Egyptian king. This piece of antique fiction, written on nineteen sheets of papyrus in a bold hieratic hand, was purchased in Italy by Mme. d'Orbiney, who sold it in 1857 to the authorities of the British museum, where it is now known as the D'Orbiney papyrus.

A Wonderful Child.

Zerah Colburn when a child had the most wonderful memory for figures ever known. He performed operations of addition, subtraction, multiplication and division on sums involving from eleven to twenty places of figures without setting one down on paper. Being once asked to raise eight to the sixteenth power, he almost instantly responded, "The answer is 281,474,976,710,656."

Could Shout For Joy.

"I want to thank you from the bottom of my heart," wrote C. B Rader, of Lewisburg, W. Va., "for the wonderful double benefit I got from Electric Bitters, in curing me of both a severe case of stomach trouble and of rheumatism, from which I had been an almost helpless sufferer for ten years. It suited my case as though made just for me."For dyspepsia, indigestion, jaundice, and to rid the system of kidney poisons that cause rheumatism, Electric Bitters have no equal. Try them. Deafness Cannot Be Cured by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

What They Quarreled About

"I never can understand why a woman wants to keep a room as dark as a pocket!"

"And I never can see why a man can't read a paper without having every blind in the house wide open!"

Sunday noon—a cloudy Sunday—when Paul had felt too tired to go to church and Frances had gone alone. Returning in the state of readiness for irritation that often follows spiritual uplift, she found her husband in the parlor, haloed by tobacco smoke and encompassed by Sunday papers. Every shade was up to its full height, every curtain pushed aside.

The sermon had been on "The Sins of the Tongue." If it hadn't been for that Frances felt she could have said volumes as she went about the room, straightening curtains and shades. As her efforts narrowed the light which fell on her husband's paper, he looked up with some annoyance.

"You make it so dark I can't read," he commented.

"There's no sense to having everything sprawled wide open like that. It makes the house look horrid to have the shades clear up to the top of the windows."

Then came the remark with which this began and Frances' retort. With the words a recollection of the sermon flashed into her mind and she shut her lips tightly and stooped to pick up the scattered papers.

"Here, I'll do that," said Paul, rising lazily. "But what's the sense of picking them up before I've done reading them?"

"They look so untidy!"

There's no one here to be hurt by it except us, and I certainly don't mind it!"

"And I certainly do!"

"I beg your pardon. Of course, if they don't suit you they must go!"

"Do just as you please! I don't care how you keep the place!"

And Frances left the room with dignity, her head very straight. To go to church and say your prayers and come home feeling happy and good, and then to be met by a thing like this the moment you got into the house! What was the use?

Like a profane echo came the murmur from the room she had quitted; "Oh, hell, what's the use?"

Frances stood still. Should she go upstairs and cry or go back and laugh. Then—was it the sermon or the swear?—she began to giggle. That saved the day. She dropped into a seat on the bottom step and broke into a shriek of laughter.

"Hullo! What's the matter?" from Paul.

"It's so funny! Here I come home feeling pious and prayerful, and lose my temper the first thing and scold, and you swear! Say, isn't it funny?"

"If that's the way you look at it—"

"Well, it is! Leave your old papers all over the room if you want, and put the pesky shades out of the windows if you like. I don't care! I'd rather have any old mess than a row. Let's be comfortable!"

Paul made a circular grab at his papers. "They may go hang for all of me! I thought you were going off to cry."

"I was!"

"Well, I'm glad to know how to break up a weep. One little 'cuss word' worked the cure. By George, I'm glad I married a good sport!"

BEARS HAVE LITTLE CHANCE

A curious method of capturing wild bears is employed in certain parts of India. Four or five sturdy men are armed, two with long spears crossbarred on the handles close to the sharp two-edged blade, and two or three with ten-foot bamboos, of which the ends are smeared with bird lime.

Thus equipped and leading several powerful dogs, the hunters sally forth an hour or so before dawn. They pass along the base of the hills with the fresh morning wind blowing up from the plains below.

Should the hunters be lucky, it is not long before the fierce dogs wind the bear, and though the dogs of this species hunt silently, their straining on the leash informs their owners that the game is nigh.

The dogs are slipped and disappear in the semi-darkness. Soon their roaring and growling indicate that they have found the game. The hunters run up to the spot where the bear is fighting with the dogs.

The men with the limed poles poke the bear in the ribs and adroitly twist the ends in its long hair, thus holding it fast on each flank. The spearmen complete the operation by repeated spear thrusts.

It is said that a party of experienced men with good dogs never fail to secure the bear in this way.

Instinctive Debater.

"So you took your wife to the baseball game?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Meekton.

"Did she enjoy it?"

"Only parts of it. She thought they wasted a good deal of time running around the lot, but she thought the arguments with the umpires were quite interesting."

THE LOCAL NEWS.

We have a fine farm for sale in Deer Park township for only $21 per acre.

Fine winter weather this!

James O'Brien and Herbert Cousins went down to Oklee to day with two loads of flax.

There is to be a big ball at the Erie hall on Saturday evening December 14th. All are invited.

Mayfield tured out strong to the election and voted for 0. Now they can say that they have an ex-County Commissioner.

Karl Klementson is hawling water for the Erickson threshing machine and they never have to blow the hurry-up whistle.

The Sam McMahan family moved down to St.Hilare yesterday. C.L. Clark took down a load of goods for them.

The roads are now in fine condition for hawling grain, althou they are a little rough where they have not been traveled much.

The farmers now have a first class ice bridge across Red Lake River, which will last until about the middle of March.

We are pleased to note the fact that Leimers defeated that man Larson who betrayed his party as chairman of the republican county Committee, for a man who would do that is not fit to be trusted with the office of pound master.

Thomas Jacobson has four fine working oxen for sale, as he will rent his farm next year. Call and see him if you need some second hand machinery.

Wille and G. Swanson and a number of other Deer Park farmers have not got their threshing done yet, but if the present good weather continues they may get threshed yet this fall.

Mr. Weaver, a brother of Miss Flossie Weaver is visiting her and his mother, Mrs. Weaver this week, having stopped on his way home to Wisconson from the N. Dak. harvest fields.

Walter McAndress is running the new Advance seperator for Erickson Bros. this week, and they are causing the farmers to smile at the clean and rapid rate that they are disposing of the threshing.

Simon Solberg was up Monday looking after the threshing of his flax crop, but found that he was one day to late, as the machine had gone west, and he will now have to wait until it swings around the circle.

The next best thing to a bridge to get farm machinery across the Red Lake River is that big Capsen of Vaughan Bros. When you hitch that cable to a threshing machine on one side of the river and start winding it up on the other side, Mr. Machine comes across, slow but sure, and it don't make any difference if the mud and watter is deep, it comes just the same.

The Griffith dredges will complete this end of ditch 53 so as to connect with the one from the south, at the corner of section 32, the fore part of next week; so the water can be let out into the river. Work on this ditch has been done fast and in first class manner. After the two ditches meet there will only be a little shallow ditching to be done with teams, in the spring.

At the special election held in the 5th district last Tuesday to elect a County Commissioner the vote was as follows:

George Leimers	99.
J. B. Larson	80;
A.B. Mandt	77.

This gives the election to Mr. Leimers, who has made an honorable campaign, and will undoubtly make an honest and good county Commissioner.

"I had a chance to make my everlasting fortune the other day."

"Did you grab it?"

"No; I couldn't stand the conditions."

"Say, that would have been everlasting, wouldn't it?"

Very few men will venture to tell you what to do for a sick horse, but anybody will tell you what to do for yourself.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Why Stars Twinkle.

The twinkling of the stars is chiefly an effect produced in the atmosphere upon the waves of light. It is due to currents and strata of air of different densities intermingling and floating past each other, through which the light passes to the eye. It is seen much more in cold than in warm weather and nearer the horizon more than overhead. The same effect may be seen by looking out of a window over a hot radiator or a candle held on the other side of a hot stove, so that you have to look through a body of highly heated air at the candle flame. The flame will be seen to waver and quiver. In other words, the various layers of air are at different densities and in motion, hence the "twinkle."—Exchange.

The Grass Widow Defined.

It is related of a Methodist bishop that when presiding over a district conference in North Carolina he had an attack of hay fever and in consequence was somewhat irascible and impatient. A young preacher who gave a rather poor account of his work was given a severe reprimand by the bishop and asked to state the reason for his failure.

"Well, bishop," he explained, "we had a lot of trouble the first year with a grass widow, and"—

"A grass widow!" roared the bishop. "And what, pray, is a grass widow?"

"A grass widow, bishop," responded the young clergyman, "is a woman whose husband died of hay fever."—St. Louis Republic.

Perhaps.

"Why," said the young man who tried to be cynical, "are dogs and horses so much more faithful in their friendships for us than our fellow human beings?"

"Perhaps," replied Miss Cayenne, "it's often due to the fact that we treat them with so much more kindness and consideration."—Washington Star.

A Good Third.

"You admit that you are not first in her affections, yet you seem cheerful."

"Oh, I can't expect to compete with the pug dog and the rubber plant."—Washington Herald.

Knows Just Enough.

"What do you know about the stock market?" asked Poorly.

"Just enough to keep out of it," answered Richly.—Buffalo Express.

What Ailed Him.

He came creeping in at the usual hour when a man finds it convenient to enter his house with as little commotion as possible. He replied in response to the usual wifely query put to gentlemen who arrive home at that hour of the night that he had been sitting up with a sick friend. "A sick friend, indeed! And what ailed him?" "W-why, he got sat."

NOTICE

The annual Short Course in connection with the agricultural high school at Thief River Falls will open for the winter terms on Monday, December 2nd, and continue until the spring holidays. This is a part of the extension work required of all Putnam high schools and it will be organized on similar lines to that of last year and will be made as practical and useful as possible.

The subjects taught will include the common branches, agriculture, accounting, some typewriting, cooking, sowing, carpentry and black-smithing

The arithmetic will deal exclusively with practical problems and with work closely related to the activities of the student. The book keeping will comprise the study of ordinary accounts, as well as of the various forms and uses of commercial paper; it will also include a brief review of commercial law. Agriculture will deal with farm crops, dairying, stock raising and judging, farm mechanics. The latter will permit of the attendance at a school for gas tractor engines in this city, as well as the handling of various forms of smaller gas engines at the Lincoln building. Carpentry and iron work will permit the students to make iron articles for use at home, such as wagons, sleighs, wagon boxes, wheelbarrows, etc. Model frame barns and truss bridges will also be constructed. The cooking and sewing will meet the needs of those taking this work.

Any resident of the state who is over 16 years of age is eligible to enrol for the course; regardless of other qualifications. Lack of book knowledge ought not to keep any ambitious young person from enrolling, and the course will be especially planned for those who can attend school but a few winter months; whether they come from city or country.

Books are loaned to the students and there is absolutely no cost whatever to the students, except that the wood and iron used in the shops will be sold at cost.

The students will be welcomed to all athletic and literary organizations in the high school. Board and room can be easily secured at reasonable rates in good homes in this city.

Further particulars will be furnished by the undersigned on application.

SLEEPING IN CHURCH.

It Used to Be Rudely Interrupted In Olden Times In England.

One John Rudge is on record as having bequeathed to the parish of Trysull, in Shropshire, England, 20 shillings a year to be paid to "a poor man" employed to go about church in summer to keep people awake.

At another English church, that of Acton, in Cheshire, it was the practice during the middle of the last century for one of the churchwardens to proceed through the church during service with a huge wand in his hand wherewith if any one of the congregation were observed to be asleep he was instantly awakened by a tap on the head.

In Warwickshire a similar custom prevailed. A warden bearing a stout wand shaped like a hay fork at the end stepped stealthily up and down the nave and the aisles, and whenever he saw an individual asleep he touched him so effectively that the nap was broken, this being sometimes accomplished by the application of the fork to the nape of the neck.

A more playful method obtained in another church. The beadle went about during service carrying a long staff, to one end of which was attached a fox's brush and to the other a knob. With the former he gently tickled the faces of the women sleepers, while with the knob he bestowed a sharp rap on the heads of male offenders.—Exchange.

ORIENTALS APT PUPILS.

It Doesn't Take Them Long to Get the Swing of Our Ways.

About the time the Japanese or Siamese student at Harvard has come to know his way about the campus he has forgotten to prefix "honorable" to the names of professors, he remembers only dimly that he used to salaam to his elders, and he wears a cap with as careless grace and comfort as any other freshman.

If six weeks will make such transformation in the oriental six months will so change him that even his father would have difficulty in recognizing him at first glance. And he can say, "You get me, Harold, don't you, old boy?" and "Let's beat it!" as readily as though he were Boston born.

A tutor over in Cambridge takes oriental students in charge as soon as they arrive at the university and instructs them in the ways and means of acquiring a working knowledge of English. It makes no difference whether the youngsters had any education in the English language or not before they left home.

The Chinese or the Japanese student, the tutor says, is invariably quick, determined and eager to learn. Also, according to this tutor, he unlearns a lot of oriental things.—Boston Herald.

How to Boil Water.

To boil water would seem to be a very simple thing, and yet the late Charles Delmonico used to say that very few people knew how to do it. "The secret is," he said, "in putting good fresh water into a clean kettle already quite warm and setting the water to boiling quickly and then taking it right off for use in tea, coffee or other drinks before it is spoiled. To let it steam and simmer and evaporate until the good water is in the atmosphere and the lime and iron and dregs only left in the kettle is what makes a great many people sick, and it is worse than no water at all." For water boiled like this and flavored with a few drops of lemon juice Mr. Delmonico use to charge as much as for his best liquors, and he often recommended it to his customers and friends who complained of loss of appetite.

A Bold but Unprofitable Retort.

"I passed that woman in the second floor apartment downtown this afternoon with a wonderful new French hat on, and she had her chin up so high in the air she couldn't see any one she knew," said Mrs. Knox, with a tinge of resentment in her voice, as she began to pave the way to inform her husband that her own old awning was looking disgracefully shabby and ready for the church rummage sale.

Then he suddenly remembered that he had an engagement and decided this was as good a time as any to keep it.—Kansas City Star.

Didn't Sound Right.

"Ma, what does d d stand for?"

"Doctor of divinity, my dear. Don't they teach you the common abbreviations in school?"

"Oh, yes, but that doesn't seem to sound right here."

"Read it out loud, my dear."

My Dear (reading)—"Witness—I heard the defendant say, 'I'll make you suffer for this; I'll be doctor of divinity if I don't.'"—Milwaukee Sentinel.

His Kind Heart.

Squire Hornbottle—For a married man you seem to have a lot of time to loaf around the depot and stores. Newt Neversweat—You see, squire, I'm so soft hearted it breaks me all up to sit around the house and watch my wife work so hard.—Washington Times.

Genuine Economy.

Husband—We must begin to economize. Wife—Yes; I began today by cutting all your cigars lengthwise, so that they will last you twice as long.—Satire.

Selling Victor Safes and fire-proof boxes to merchants, doctors, lawyers, dentists and well-to-do farmers, all of whom realize the need of a safe, but do not know how easy it is to own one. Salesmen declare our proposition one of the best, clean-cut money-making opportunities ever received. Without previous experience YOU can duplicate the success of others. Our handsomely illustrated 200-page catalog will enable you to present the subject to customers in as interesting a manner as though you were piloting them through our factory. Men appointed as salesmen receive advice and instructions for selling safes, giving convincing talking points which it is impossible for a prospective customer to deny. Why don't YOU be the first to apply from your vicinity before someone else gets the territory? We can favor only one salesman out of each locality.

The 25th anniversary of our company was celebrated by erecting the most modern safe factory in the world. Wide-awake men who received our special selling inducement, rendered it necessary to double our output. We are spending many thousands of dollars enlarging our sales organization, but to learn all particulars, it will cost you only the price of a postal card.

The regular retail price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but to introduce we will sell you a sample pair for $4.80 (cash with order $4.55).
NO MORE TROUBLE FROM PUNCTURES
DESCRIPTION: Made in all sizes. It is lively and easy riding, very durable and lined inside with a special quality of rubber, which never becomes porous and which closes up small punctures without allowing the air to escape. We have hundreds of letters from satisfied customers stating that their tires have only been pumped up once or twice in a whole season. They weigh no more than an ordinary tire, the puncture resisting qualities being given by several layers of thin, specially prepared fabric on the tread. The regular price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but for advertising purposes we are making a special factory price to the rider of only $4.80 per pair. All orders shipped same day letter is received. We ship C. O. D. on approval. You do not pay a cent until you have examined and found them strictly as represented.
Notice the thick rubber tread "A" and puncture strips "B" and "D" also rim strip "H" to prevent rim cutting. This tire will outlast any other make—SOFT, ELASTIC and EASY RIDING.
We will allow a cash discount of 5 per cent (thereby making the price $4.55 per pair) if you send FULL CASH WITH ORDER and enclose this advertisement. You run no risk in sending us an order as the tires may be returned at OUR expense if for any reason they are not satisfactory on examination. We are perfectly reliable and money sent to us is as safe as in a bank. If you order a pair of these tires you will find that they will ride easier, run faster, wear better, last longer and look finer than any tire you have ever used or seen at any price. We know that you will be so well pleased that when you want a bicycle you will give us your order. We want you to send us a trial order at once, hence this remarkable tire offer.
IF YOU NEED TIRES don't buy any kind at any price until you send for a pair of Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof tires on approval and trial at the special introductory price quoted above; or write for our big Tire and Sundry Catalogue which describes and quotes all makes and kinds of tires at about half the usual prices.
DO NOT WAIT but write us a postal today. DO NOT THINK OF BUYING a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone until you know the new and wonderful offers we are making. It only costs a postal to learn everything. Write it NOW.

WOMEN SHOULD NEVER USE HARSH PHYSICS

Women are especially susceptible to constipation and their more delicate organisms rebel at the violence of cathartics and purgatives. Drastic medicines like salts, mineral waters, pills and powders may afford temporary relief, but their violent action on the stomach and bowels tends to upset the entire system.

A mild laxative is far preferable and more effective. The combination of simple laxative herbs with pepsin prescribed by Dr. W. B. Caldwell, and sold in drug stores under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is ideal for women, being gentle in action, positive in effect and pleasant to the taste. A spoonful of Syrup Pepsin at night will bring natural relief next morning and, used regularly for a brief period, will so strengthen and tone the muscles of the stomach and bowels that there will be little, if any, further need for medicine.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin can be procured in any drug store. Your name and address on a postal to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 West St., Monticello, Ill., will bring a free trial bottle by return mail. Adv.

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Annie Gattle, a fellow-passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers. Mrs. Wellington hears Little Jimmie's voice. Later she meets Mrs. Whitcomb. Mallory reports to Marjorie his failure to find a preacher. They decide to pretend a quarrel and Mallory finds a vacant berth. Mrs. Jimmie discovers Wellington on the train. Mallory again makes an unsuccessful hunt for a preacher. Dr. Temple poses as a physician. Mrs. Temple is induced by Mrs. Wellington to smoke a cigar. Sight of preacher on a station platform raises Mallory's hopes, but he takes another train. Missing hand baggage compels the couple to borrow from passengers. Jimmie gets a cinder in his eye and Mrs. Jimmie gives first aid. Coolness is then resumed. Still no clergyman. More borrowing. Dr. Temple puzzled by behavior of different couples. Marjorie's jealousy aroused by Mallory's baseball jargon. Marjorie suggests wrecking the train in hopes that accident will produce a preacher. Also tries to induce conductor to hold the train so she can shop. Marjorie's dog is missing. She pulls the cord, stopping the train. Conductor restores dog and lovers quarrel. Lathrop wires for a preacher to marry him and Miss Gattle. Mallory tells Lathrop of his predicament and arranges to borrow the preacher. Kitty Lewellyn, former sweetheart of Mallory's, appears and arouses Marjorie's jealousy. Preacher boards train. After marrying Lathrop and Miss Gattle the preacher escapes Mallory by leaping from moving train. Mallory's dejection moves Marjorie to reconciliation. The last day on the train brings Mallory the fear of missing his transport. Mallory gets a Nevada marriage license.

CHAPTER XXXIV—Continued.

Seeing them together, Mrs. Temple watched the embrace with her daily renewal of joy that the last night's quarrel had not proved fatal. She nudged her husband:

"See, they're making up again."

Dr. Temple was moved to a violent outburst for him: "Well, that the darnedest bridal couple—I only said darn, my dear."

He was still more startled when Mr. Baumann, cruising along the aisle, bent over to murmur: "Can I fix you a nice divorce?"

Dr. Temple rose in such an attitude of horror as he assumed in the pulpit when denouncing the greatest curse of society, and Mr. Baumann retired. As he passed Mallory he cast an appreciative glance at Marjorie and, tapping Mallory's shoulder, whispered: "No wonder you want a marriage license. I'll be in the next car, should you need me." Then he went on his route.

Marjorie stared after him in wonder and asked: "What did that person mean by what he said?"

"It's all right, Marjorie," Mallory explained, in the highest cheer: "We can get married right away."

"But here's the license—see?"

"What good is that?" she said; "there's no preacher on board."

"But that man is a justice of the peace and he'll marry us."

Marjorie stared at him incredulously: "That creature!—before all these passengers?"

"Not at all," Mallory explained. "We'll go into the smoking room."

Marjorie leaped to her feet, aghast: "Elope two thousand miles to be married in a smoking room by a Yiddish drummer! Harry Mallory, you're crazy"

Put just that way, the proposition did not look so alluring as at first. He sank back with a sigh: "I guess I am. I resign."

He was as weary of being "foiled again" as the villain of a cheap melodrama. The two lovers sat in a twilight of deep melancholy, till Marjorie's mind dug up a new source of alarm:

"Harry, I've just thought of something terrible."

"Let's have it," he sighed, drearily.

"We reach San Francisco at midnight and you sail at daybreak. What becomes of me?"

Mallory had no answer to this problem, except a grim: "I'll not desert you."

"But we'll have no time to get married."

"Then," he declared with iron resolve, "then I'll resign from the army."

Marjorie stared at him with awe. He was so wonderful, so heroic. "But what will the country do without you?"

"It will have to get along the best it can," he answered with finality. "Do you think I'd give you up?"

But this was too much to ask. In the presence of a ruined career and a heroless army, Marjorie felt that her own scruples were too petty to count. She could be heroic, too.

"No!" she said, in a deep, low tone, "No, we'll get married in the smoking room. Go call your drummer!"

This opened the clouds and let in the sun again with such a radiant blaze that Mallory hesitated no longer. "Fine!" he cried, and leaped to his feet, only to be detained again by Marjorie's clutch:

"But first, what about that bracelet?"

"She's got it," Mallory groaned, slumping from the heights again.

"Do you mean to say she's still wearing it?"

"How was I to get it?"

"Couldn't you have slipped into her car last night and stolen it?"

"Good Lord, I shouldn't think you'd want me to go—why, Marjorie—I'd be arrested!"

But Marjorie set her jaw hard: "Well, you get that bracelet, or you don't get me." And then her smouldering jealousy and grief took a less hateful tone: "Oh, Harry!" she wailed, "I'm so lonely and so helpless and so far from home."

"But I'm here," he urged.

"You're farther away than anybody," she whimpered, huddling close to him.

"Poor little thing," he murmured, soothing her with voice and kiss and caress.

"Put your arm round me," she cooed, like a mourning dove, "I don't care if everybody is looking. Oh, I'm so lonely."

"I'm just as lonely as you are," he pleaded, trying to creep into the company of her misery.

"Please marry me soon," she implored, "won't you, please?"

"I'd marry you this minute if you'd say the word," he whispered.

"I'd say it if you only had that bracelet," she sobbed, like a tired child. "I should think you would understand my feelings. That awful person is wearing your bracelet and I have only your ring, and her bracelet is ten times as big as my r-i-n-g, boo-hoo-hoo-oo!"

"I'll get that bracelet if I have to chop her arm off," Mallory vowed.

The sobs stopped short, as Marjorie looked up to ask: "Have you got your sword with you?"

"It's in my trunk," he said, "but I'll manage."

"Now you're speaking like a soldier," Marjorie exclaimed, "my brave, noble, beautiful, fearless husband. I'll tell you! That creature will pass through this car on her way to breakfast. You grab her and take the bracelet away from her."

"I grab her, eh?" he stammered, his heroism wavering a trifle.

"Yes, just grab her."

"Suppose she hasn't the bracelet on?" he mused.

"Grab her anyway," Marjorie answered, fiercely. "Besides, I've no doubt it's welded on." He said nothing. "You did wish it on, didn't you?"

"No, no—never—of course not—" he protested. "If you'll only be calm. I'll get it if I have to throttle her."

Like a young Lady Macbeth, Marjorie gave him her utter approval in any atrocity, and they sat in ambush for their victim to pass into view.

They had not had their breakfast, but they forgot it. A dusky waiter went by chanting his "Lass call for breakfuss in Rining Rar." He chanted it thrice in their ears, but they never heard. Marjorie was gloating over the discomfiture of the odious creature who had dared to precede her in the acquaintance of her husband-to-be. The husband-to-be was miserably wishing that he had to face a tribe of bolo-brandishing Moros, instead of this trivial girl whom he had looked upon when her cheeks were red.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Mr. and Mrs. Little Jimmie.

Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb had longed for the sweet privilege of squaring matters with Mrs. Jimmie Wellington. Sneers and back-biting, shrugs and shudders of contempt were poor compensation for the ever-vivid fact that Mrs. Wellington had proved attractive to her Sammy while Mrs. Wellington's Jimmie never looked at Mrs. Whitcomb. Or if he did, his eyes had been so blurred that he had seen two of her—and avoided both.

Yesterday she had overheard Jimmie vow sobriety. Today his shining morning face showed that he had kept his word. She could hardly wait to begin the flirtation which, she trusted, would render Mrs. Wellington helplessly furious for six long Reno months.

The Divorce Drummer interposed and held Jimmie prisoner for a time, but as soon as Mr. Baumann released him, Mrs. Whitcomb apprehended him. With a smile that beckoned and with eyes that went out like far-cast fishhooks, she drew Leviathan into her net.

She reeled him in and he plounced in the seat opposite. What she took for bashfulness was reluctance. To add the last charm to her success, Mrs. Wellington arrived to see it. Mrs. Whitcomb saw the lonely Ashton rise and offer her the seat facing him. Mrs. Wellington took it and sat down with the back of her head so close to the back of Mr. Wellington's head that the feather in her hat tickled his neck.

Jimmie Wellington had seen his wife pass by. To his sober eyes she was a fine sight as she moved up the aisle. In his alcohol-emancipated mind the keen sense of wrong endured that had driven him forth to Reno began to lose its edge. His own soul appealed from Jimmie drunk to Jimmie sober. The appellate judge began to reverse the lower court's decision, point by point.

He felt a sudden recrudescence of jealousy as he heard Ashton's voice unctuously, flirtatiously offering his wife hospitality. He wanted to trounce Ashton. But what right had he to defend from gallantry the woman he was about to forswear before the world? Jimmie's soul was in turmoil, and Mrs. Whitcomb's pretty face and alluring smile only annoyed him.

She had made several gracious speeches before he quite comprehended any of them. Then he realized that she was saying, "I'm so glad you're going to stop at Reno, Mr. Wellington."

"Thank you. So am I," he mumbled, trying to look interested and wishing that his wife's plume would not tickle his neck.

Mrs. Whitcomb went on, leaning closer: "We two poor mistreated wretches must try to console one another, mustn't we?"

"Yes,—yes,—we must," Wellington nodded, with a sickly cheer.

Mrs. Whitcomb leaned a little closer. "Do you know that I feel almost related to you, Mr. Wellington?"

"Related?" he echoed, "you?—to me? How?"

"My husband knew your wife so well."

Somehow a wave of jealous rage surged over him, and he growled: "Your husband is a scoundrel."

Mrs. Whitcomb's smile turned to vinegar: "Oh, I can't permit you to slander the poor boy behind his back. It was all your wife's fault."

Wellington amazed himself by his own bravery when he heard himself volleying back: "And I can't permit you to slander my wife behind her back. It was all your husband's fault."

Mrs. Jimmie overheard this behind her back, and it strangely thrilled her. She ignored Ashton's existence and listened for Mrs. Whitcomb's next retort. It consisted of a simple, icy drawl: "I think I'll go to breakfast."

She seemed to pick up Ashton with her eyes as she glided by, for, finding himself unnoticed, he rose with a careless: "I think I'll go to breakfast," and followed Mrs. Whitcomb. The Wellingtons sat dos-a-dos for some exciting seconds, and then on a sudden impulse, Mrs. Jimmie rose, knelt in the seat and spoke across the back of it:

"It was very nice of you to defend me, Jimmie—er—James."

Wellington almost dislocated several joints in rising quickly and whirling round at the cordiality of her tone. But his smile vanished at her last word. He protested, feebly: "James sounds so like a—a butler. Can't you call me Little Jimmie again?"

Mrs. Wellington smiled indulgently: "Well, since it's the last time Good-bye, Little Jimmie." And she put out her hand. He seized it hungrily and clung to it: "Good-bye?—aren't you getting off at Reno?"

"Yes, but—"

"So am I—Lucretia."

"But we can't afford to be seen together."

Still holding her hand, he temporized: "We've got to stay married for six months at least—while we establish a residence. Couldn't we—er—couldn't we establish a residence—er—together?"

Mrs. Wellington's eyes grew a little red, as she answered: "It would be too lonesome waiting for you to roll home."

Jimmie stared at her. He felt the regret in her voice and took strange courage from it. He hauled from his pocket his huge flask, and said quickly: "Well, if you're jealous of this I'll promise to cork it up forever."

She shook her head skeptically: "You couldn't."

"Just to prove it," he said, "I'll chuck it out of the window." He flung up the sash and made ready to hurl his enemy into the flying landscape.

"Bravo!" cried Mrs. Wellington.

But even as his hand was about to let go, he tightened his clutch again, and pondered: "It seems a shame to waste it."

"I thought so," said Mrs. Jimmie, drooping perceptibly. Her husband began to feel that, after all, she cared what became of him.

"I'll tell you," he said, "I'll give it to old Doc Temple. He takes his straight."

"Fine!"

He turned towards the seat where the clergyman and his wife were sitting, oblivious of the drama of reconciliation playing so close at hand. Little Jimmie paused, caressed the flask, and kissed it. "Good-bye, old playmate!" Then, tossing his head with bravado, he reached out and touched the clergyman's shoulder. Dr. Temple turned and rose with a questioning look. Wellington put the flask in his hand and chuckled: "Merry Christmas!"

"But, my good man—" the preacher objected, finding in his hand a donation about as welcome and as wieldy as a strange baby. Wellington winked: "It may come in handy for—your pellcots."

And now, struck with a sudden idea, Mrs. Wellington spoke: "Oh Mrs. Temple."

"Yes, my dear," said the little old lady, rising. Mrs. Wellington placed in her hand a small portfolio and laughed: "Happy New Year!"

Mrs. Temple stared at her gift and gasped: "Great heavens! Your cigars!"

"They'll be such a consolation," Mrs. Wellington explained, "while a doctor is out with his patients."

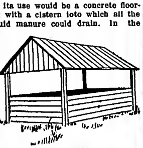
FARM AND BEES

GOOD MANURE SHED NEEDED

Protection Should Cover a Door at End of Alley Back of Stalls—Much Fertilizer Saved.

A shed may easily be built at one end of the barn for the gathering and protection of manure against the weather. The shed should cover a door at the end of the alley behind the stalls, and the floor of the barn so arranged with a drop that all manure, both liquid and solid, is caught and easily moved toward the door and this shed. If the fields are dry enough the manure spreader may be driven under the shed and loaded directly from the barn door.

If the fields are too wet for use of the spreader then the manure may be protected from rain and consequent waste. The only thing that could be added to this shed to make it perfect for its use would be a concrete flooring with a cistern into which all the liquid manure could drain. In the absence of this use of straw for bedding whenever possible, as this will serve to absorb practically all of the liquid part of the manure.



A Good Manure Shed.

Taken in the aggregate, there can be no question that thousands of dollars' worth of valuable fertilizer is wasted each year through loss of liquid manure and through the leeching of manure piles that are stored in the barn yards without shelter. The question of the best method in which to preserve the liquid manure is well worthy of study.

The Agricultural College of Manhattan, Kan., has its large barn yard paved with stone, which drains to a central cistern, where all the liquid manure is collected and later pumped out for distribution on the grass and other crops.

BULLETIN OF HONEY PRODUCT

Farmers Bulletin No. 503, United States department of agriculture, has recently sent out a bulletin on comb honey that will be of particular interest to bee keepers. It is by George S. Demuth, agricultural assistant, bureau of entomology, and treats at considerable length of the comb product, analyzing the best practice and pointing out some essentials to the production of maximum crops of the best grades.

The bulletin is mainly an argument in favor of the production of attractive, high quality comb honey, and since this combination can only be secured in rather limited areas, it is urged that those only who are so favored by location will find it profitable to run to comb honey.

The bulletin also calls attention to the fact that the tendency in bee keeping is decidedly toward the production of extracted, rather than comb honey, and, it says, if the general public finally becomes convinced of the purity and wholesomeness of extracted honey, it will become a staple article of food. "Present tendencies, therefore, emphasize the desirability of comb honey of the most attractive appearance possible."

PROTECTION FOR BEE HIVES

The stand, shown in the illustration, will do very nicely for both winter and summer. The back and ends may be boarded up and the hives packed with leaves for winter. If made 7 feet long and 3 feet wide it will accommodate four hives. The hives are set in two pairs with a space between each of the pairs the width of a hive. This is convenient when making the spring interchange of brood chambers. The 2x4-inch sills on which the hives rest are 1½ and 2 inches from the ground, the rear sill being the highest. The roofs of the stands are made of light half-inch boards, and are high enough above the hives to allow of necessary tiering up and easy handling of supers.

160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

Your Opportunity is NOW in the Province of Saskatchewan, Western Canada

Do you desire to get a Free Homestead of 160 ACRES of that well known Wheat Land? The area is becoming more limited but no less valuable.

NEW DISTRICTS have recently been opened up for settlement, and into these railroads are now being built. The day will soon come when there will be no Free Homesteading land left.

A Swift Current, Saskatchewan, farmer writes: "I came on my homestead, March 1906, with about $1,000 worth of horses and machinery, and just $35 in cash. Today I have 900 acres of wheat, 300 acres of oats, and 50 acres of flax." Not bad for six years, but only an instance of what may be done in Western Canada in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta.

Wireless Map.

A novelty in the way of maps has just been issued by the German imperial postoffice, which has compiled a chart showing the principal wireless telegraph stations in the world. The object is to advertise the facilities now afforded in Germany for "drahtlose" telegraphy. German stations are, of course, given special prominence on the map, and in this connection it is interesting to note that the station at Neuen is claimed to be the most powerful in existence, its range being 2,100 miles. This is two hundred miles more than that of Eiffel tower.

IS TO BE PERMANENT

MINN. AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT CONGRESS TO BE NEW NAME.

APPROPRIATION ASKED.

Governor Eberhart and Maude Ballington Booth Close Sessions Saturday Night.

Minneapolis.—The Minnesota conservation and agricultural congress has become a permanent organization. The word "Conservation" has been dropped from its name, however.

It was unanimously decided at Saturday morning's session that another meeting should be held next year and annually thereafter. The name of the organization will be the Minnesota Agricultural Development congress.

A resolution was passed asking the legislature to pass a law authorizing the governor to appoint a Minnesota agricultural development commission. The legislature will be asked to appropriate enough money to take care of the permanent organization. It was also decided to have the permanent chairman of the congress draft the bill.

Time Debated.

There was some debate regarding the time for the next meeting. Some wanted it to take place the first week in December of next year and others wanted it the first week in January, 1914. The matter was finally left to the executive board for decision.

Dan A. Wallace, of St. Paul, advocated a state agricultural department to take up the work now being done by a large number of boards, in an address delivered at the conservation congress Saturday morning.

"In studying the work which other states are doing for agriculture, it seems to me that it would be an eminently practical idea for us to have in the state of Minnesota a department or commission of agriculture, instead of having a confusion of boards and commissions for the administration of agricultural affairs of the state," he said. "Why should we not supplant this idea with a systematized organization of bureaus grouped under a state department of agriculture."

State Agricultural Society Scored.

Mr. Wallace attacked the work of the Minnesota Agricultural society. He said:

"The annual meeting of the Minnesota Agricultural society is really but a political convention in miniature, the effective result of the educational features of the program being practically nullified. This is great misfortune, for there is really serious need of at least one great conference each year where agriculture is the chief and only theme for discussion. The situation has become so acute in the affairs of the Minnesota Agricultural society that it is quite possible that the educational features of the annual meeting will be entirely divorced from the ordinary business session, the affiliated organizations preferring to hold their meetings in different parts of the state where they can be free from the atmosphere of politics which is always present at the St. Paul and Minneapolis meetings. Under a state department of agriculture the state and county fairs are merely one feature of the work of the department.

Constructive Legislation Wanted.

"If you would inquire what is wrong with the present administrative functions of the state in relation to agriculture, it seems to me that the general statement would hold true that there is at the present time a lack of sufficient constructive legislation for the protection of agricultural interests," continued Mr. Wallace. "There is likewise a lack of direct responsibility on the part of the various state bureaus and commissions, there is a lack of intelligent information as to our soil, and a woeful lack of statistical information. There is a duplication of work, there is the harmful effect of a political atmosphere, which lends to constant scandal, and worst of all a serious lack of business efficiency. Though I do not know that a state department of agriculture would straighten out all of these difficulties, however, our present method suggests confusion, whereas a plan of state department of agriculture provides orderly organizations."

H. R. Smith, professor of animal husbandry at the agricultural college, spoke on "Dairying and Live Stock as a Means of Developing the Northwest," at the morning session of the congress.

"There has never been a time in the history of the United States when there has been a greater need for the development of the live stock industry than now, and there is no section of the country where the need is more urgent than in the Northwest," said Professor Smith.

"Prices are high on animal products because there is a scarcity of live stock," he said. "How could we expect anything but high prices on beef in view of the fact that there are eight per cent less beef cattle in total and 21 per cent less beef steers in the country today than 10 years ago, whereas there are 21 per cent more people to feed."

Professor Smith said that the farmers of Minnesota and other western states had neglected the raising of live stock for the raising of wheat. He pleaded for a return to the live stock industry and showed what could be gained by such a course. He showed how important the raising of live stock was to the fertility of the soil.

Governor Norris of Montana, who was to have appeared on the program Saturday, spoke Friday night instead. Besides Governor Norris, who spoke on the subject of "The Great Northwest," Miss Margaret Evans, dean of women at Carleton college, spoke on "Child Conservation," and Mrs. E. H. Loyhed, president Minnesota Federation of Women's clubs, discussed the work that the club women are doing in Minnesota. H. Longstreet Taylor ended the evening session with a discussion of what should be and what can be done in the fight against tuberculosis.

"The most effective way to prevent American emigration to Canada is to adopt a more liberal policy towards settlers upon their public lands," said Governor Norris of Montana in his address at the Conservation congress last night.

"With its many and superior advantages the Northwest should speedily become thickly populated and fully developed; but the public land policy of the government must be changed."

Maude Ballington Booth, noted prison worker, spoke on "The Discharged Prisoner—An Asset." Governor Eberhart was also on the program for one of the closing addresses. The registration was 4,531 persons.

CANVASSING DONE.

Certifies for First Time the Popular Choice for United States Senator.

St. Paul.—Minnesota's vote on president and on state officers and congressman has just been officially declared by the state canvassing board. Complete tables of the vote already had been made up from duplicate returns by direction of Julius A. Schmahl, secretary of state and chairman of the board. The original returns were opened by the members of the board, checked, and the results found to be identical with the unofficial figures announced at the capitol last week. Theodore Roosevelt's official plurality in Minnesota is 19,430, and Governor A. O. Eberhart led P. M. Ringdal by 30,029.

Endeavorers Elect New Officers.

Hastings.—At the eleventh annual convention of the River District Christian Endeavor union the following officers were elected: President, Rev. G. E. Reihert, Winona; vice president, Miss Anna L. Hartin of Hastings; secretary, Miss Eliza Larson of Lake City; treasurer, Earl Jewell of Winona; junior superintendent, Miss Mildred Wruck of Winona; missionary chairman, Miss Claretta Kee of Rochester. The 1913 convention will be held in Farmington.

Consul Admits His Guilt.

Duluth.—V. D. Nicholich, Montenegrin consul and representative in the United States and Canada, pleaded guilty to one of the two indictments returned against him by the November grand jury charging him with grand larceny in the first degree. Nickolich has been held a prisoner in Duluth since Sept. 26, when he was arrested, accused of withholding trust funds from several estates left in his keeping. He will serve from one to ten years at Stillwater.

ALLEGED EMBEZZLER IS CAUGHT

ARRESTED IN GEORGIA—SAID TO BE FORMER BANKER.

Atlanta, Ga., Nov. 30.—Believed to be H. W. Parker, the embezzling vice president of the Bank of Commerce of Winnebago, Minn., J. M. Long, prominent business man and leading social figure in Westpoint, Georgia, a small city near Atlanta, has just been arrested and is being held for Pinkerton identification experts. Long has been in Westpoint since spring.

He is proprietor and manager of the Grand theatre, a leading playhouse of West Point, is promoter of several enterprises and he and his wife are dominant figures in social circles. He married in Atlanta shortly after reaching Georgia, going immediately from this city to the place in which he was arrested.

His wife is a former Cincinnati actress, who since the revelation of her hectic career, has refused to tell her name. She and Long resided in a palatial home in Westpoint which became one of the most popular homes in the city for the many elaborate social events held therein.

According to Pinkerton detectives, which organization has pursued the absconding bank official over the entire continent and even foreign shores, the embezzlement was committed during early 1912.

The men arrested in Westpoint had just invested in much real estate and had expressed his intention of making Georgia his permanent home.

A few weeks ago the Pinkertons sent the Parker "man hunt" circular to officials in Westpoint. Widespread attention to it was attracted by the luring reward of $1,250. The striking resemblance in the picture of the fugitive bank president to the meteoric Westpoint citizen aroused the mayor, John T. Johnson and two railway detectives to investigation.

The arrest threw the entire community into a ferment of excitement. The jail was besieged with friends of the prisoner offering support in every conceivable manner. Calm and complacent, Long smilingly greeted his supporters and assured them that his arrest was a ridiculous farce.

He grew reticent, however, when questioned by officials who had caused his arrest, and would say nothing, except that he had never resided in Minnesota and knew nothing whatever of the embezzlement of which he had been accused.

A dramatic feature to the arrest was created when the prisoner's young wife came to the jail and pleaded with the jailor to permit her to remain in the cell with her husband. She was forced out of the building crying hysterically, and almost collapsed when placed in a cab to be sent home.

Long is about 45 years old, and is versatile in accomplishment. He handles a telegraph instrument with the same efficiency with which he managed his successful business affairs in Westpoint.

Winnebago, Minn.—Harry W. Parker, the absconding vice president of the State Bank of Commerce of this city and who is reported to have been captured in a small Georgia town left here on the 29th of April last. He told friends that he was going to Minneapolis to look after his candidacy for grand master of the state Odd Fellows' lodge.

It did not dawn on anyone for two or three days after he had gone that he did not intend to return until it was found that the bank was short of funds amounting to approximately $20,000.

He was an expert telegrapher, which seems a strong bit of evidence that the captured man is he.

Justice Bunn Named.

St. Paul.—Associate Justice George L. Bunn, resident of St. Paul, whose term of office expires January 1, received the appointment from Governor Eberhart to the position on the supreme bench vacated by Justice Calvin L. Brown, who was elected to the position of chief justice in the recent election. This was the governor's busy day for making appointments. Frank Catlin, chief of police in St. Paul, is named to succeed Judge Oscar Hallam of the Ramsay district court, who was elected to a place on the supreme bench.

Three Hurt in Car Crash.

Minneapolis.—Three men were injured, one very seriously, when a street car and an automobile collided at Thirty-first street and Grand avenue south. Edward O. Brown, 1802 James avenue south, treasurer Brown Brothers' Mercantile company, was injured.

Schools Hold Industrial Contest.

Fergus Falls.—An Otter Tail county industrial contest was held in this city, and exhibits were shown from the schools in all part of the county.

Exciting Street Fracas.

Minneapolis.—Two St. Paul men, standing on the sidewalk outside Brackett's grocery store on Fifth st., between Nicollet and Hennepin avenues, each with a revolver pressed against the other's stomach, caused considerable excitement, augmented when a third man appeared, knocked the smaller of the two down, attempted, to wrest the weapon out of his hand and came near being shot for his interference. The revolver exploded twice, one bullet passing through a window.

HAIR CAME OUT IN BUNCHES

813 E. Second St., Muncie, Ind.—"My little girl had a bad breaking out on the scalp. It was little white lumps. The pimples would break out as large as a common pinhead all over her head. They would break and run yellow matter. She suffered nearly a year with itching and burning. It was sore and itched all the time. The matter that ran from her head was very thick. I did not comb her hair very often, her head was too sore to comb it, and when I did comb, it came out in bunches. Some nights her head itched so had she could not sleep.

"I tried several different soaps and ointments, also patent medicine, but nothing could I get to stop it. I began using Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment this summer after I sent for the free samples. I used them and they did so much good I bought a cake of Cuticura Soap and some Cuticura Ointment. I washed her head with Cuticura Soap and rubbed the Cuticura Ointment in the scalp every two weeks. A week after I had washed her head three times you could not tell she ever had a breaking out on her head. Cuticura Soap and Ointment also made the hair grow beautifully." (Signed) Mrs. Emma Patterson, Dec. 22, 1911.

Old Landmark Gone.

The Blaine schoolhouse in Mare Hill up on the hill, the one James G. Blaine honored years ago by giving a bell, which still hangs in the belfry, is no more. It has been converted into a storeroom and moved to another site. A good many bright boys and girls, now old men and women, graduated from the historic building, and no doubt there is a feeling of sorrow as the old schoolhouse leaves the foundation it was builded upon years and years ago.—Kennebec (Me.) LOOK AFTER YOUR HEALTH

If Your System Is Kept Toned Up You Will Escape Many Diseases That Find Easy Victims Among Pale People.

Enough disease germs enter the average human body every day to cause death if the healthful organism did not combat these germs and render them harmless.

Let the human system become run down, or debilitated, and this power of resistance to disease is weakened. Soon the disease germs get the upper hand, an acute sickness follows or the patient becomes a chronic invalid.

It is in the blood that the battle to maintain the health is fought. Keep the blood toned up, the bowels open and observe ordinary care as regards food and rest and you will avoid much sickness.

Debility is not a recognized disease but is a condition in which the sufferer cannot get a good night's sleep, wakes up all tired out, has no strength or ambition, is nervous, has a poor appetite, has trouble with the stomach, and is subject to headaches and backaches. It is most commonly met with in people who have to work hard, are confined indoors, eat improper food or have worries and grief.

The case of Mrs. M. V. McCaslin, of No. 202 South 27th Street, Lincoln, Neb., shows the value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as a tonic for all run-down conditions of health. She says:

"I gave Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People a trial for general debility from which I had been suffering about three years. I was thoroughly tired and worn out and had no ambition for anything. I became very weak and kept losing strength. My appetite was poor and I was nervous and had severe headaches.

"I needed a tonic treatment and tried several tonic remedies but none seemed to help me until I tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I was soon much improved in health and able to get around and do my work. I took the pills until cured and am pleased to recommend them to anyone who is run down in health."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are for sale by all druggists, or will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50 by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

In this age of research and experiment, all nature is ransacked by the scientific for the comfort and happiness of man. Science has indeed made giant strides in the past century, and among the—by no means least important—discoveries in medicine is that of Therapion, which has been used with great success in French Hospitals and that it is worthy the attention of those who suffer from kidney, bladder, nervous diseases, chronic weaknesses, ulcers, skin eruptions, piles, &c. there is no doubt. In fact it seems evident from the big stir created amongst specialists, that THERAPION is destined to cast into oblivion all those questionable remedies that were formerly the sole reliance of medical men. It is of course impossible to tell sufferers all we should like to tell them in this short article, but those who would like to know more about this remedy that has effected so many—we might almost say, miraculous cures, should send addressed envelope for FREE book to Dr. Le Clerc Med. Co., Haverstock Road, Hampstead, London, Eng. and decide for themselves whether the New French Remedy "THERAPION" No. 1, No. 2 or No. 3 is what they require and have been seeking in vain during a life of misery, suffering, ill health and unhappiness. Therapion is sold by druggists or mail $1.00. Fougera Co., 90 Beekman St., New York.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyser

TRACKED BY A DREAM

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

MANY PEOPLE know the extraordinary story of a happening to M. Berard, for many years judge, and, afterward, member of the Chamber of Deputies.

A few months after he had been called to the bench he went for an excursion in the Cevennes Mountains and spent the night in a lonely inn. He fell asleep and had a terrible nightmare. He saw the innkeeper and his wife steal up to his bed, and, while the woman grasped both his arms, the husband raised a long, sharp knife, and stabbed him in the throat. They then carried him out of the room, threw him into a deep hole behind the house, and covered him with refuse.

When M. Berard awoke, it took him a long time to shake off the effects of this fearful dream, and, even while he dressed, he still seemed to feel the cuts in his throat.

Before leaving the house where he spent such an unpleasant night, he gazed long at the host and hostess, and could not help thinking they looked villainous.

A year later M. Berard was appointed assistant judge in the very district where his sleep had been so unexpectedly disturbed, and the first thing he learned was that the authorities there were investigating a crime that had been committed some months before. A notary, who had collected a large sum of money, had mysteriously disappeared, and there was no doubt that the unfortunate man had been assassinated.

On the very day of M. Berard's arrival the police had received an anonymous communication informing them that this notary had entered a certain tavern, and since that moment had not been seen. The examining magistrate had the innkeeper and his wife brought before him, and asked M. Berard to be present at this interview.

When they entered the room, M. Berard could hardly suppress an exclamation as he recognized his host and hostess of the country inn. His dream rose up before him, and he asked the magistrate to be allowed to say something to the man and woman, who violently protested their innocence.

"You are the murderers," he said, "and I will even tell you how you committed the crime. You, the man, stabbed your victim with your large knife, and, together, you carried the body to a deep hole, covering it with refuse. It must be there now."

The couple looked thunderstruck. Then the wife was seized with a fit of trembling, and before another moment had passed both confessed their crime. The body of the unfortunate man was found in the very spot named by M. Berard.

It is not for me to explain this strange incident, which at the time created a tremendous sensation. All I know is that but for an extraordinary dream I, too, might possibly never have discovered who committed the murder at Vincennes.

In January, 1891, I was informed, early in the morning, that an old lady, a Madame Bazire, living in a small apartment in the Rue de Terrier, Vincennes, had been found strangled.

I at once started for Vincennes with M. Guillot, the magistrate, and went straight to the house, where everything had been left undisturbed.

In a poorly furnished bedroom, ornamented with banners, rosaries, and pictures of saints, lay the body of the old creature, face downward.

The murderer had strangled her, and had placed on her back a curious looking old trunk, covered with boarskins and provided with four rollers. Never before had I seen such a trunk.

Madame Bazire, well known in the neighborhood, was a quiet, inoffensive woman, most religious, who, during the thirty years she had resided at Vincennes, had never missed either morning mass or vespers. On the morning of the murder she had gone to mass at nine, telling the concierge that she would return soon, because she wanted to put her room in order.

At first, nobody in the house troubled about her, as it was thought that she might have come back late without being noticed. The next day, however, the neighbors began to feel uneasy.

Madame Bazire received every morning Le Messager de Sainte Philomene, a little religious paper which tells pious people what prayers they have to say during the day. When it was remarked that Le Messager de Sainte Philomene remained untouched under the door, the neighbors rang her bell, and, receiving no reply, sent for the police commissary.

My first impression was that robbery had been the motive of the crime. All the cupboards had been ransacked, and on the floor were several small bundles of linen and clothes—of which Madame Bazire had a large quantity—and which the assassin, for some reason or other, had left behind. Only a big clock that used to stand on the mantelpiece, and, according to the neighbors, weighed more than forty pounds, had disappeared. On the marble slab the thin coating of dust showed the spot where it had stood.

On the other hand, Madame Bazire's gold watch was still hanging on a nail near her bed. If the murderer had gone there bent on robbery, why did he leave the watch, and carry off the cumbrous and less valuable timepiece?

Moreover, the poor lady, who had but a small annuity, was known to have little money in the house, for she had put off a few payments for the following day, when she intended to collect her quarterly payment from the bank. And when I inquired at that establishment I learned that Madame Bazire had not called there.

I was puzzled, and sounded the neighbors one after the other. They, however, had but little to say, with the exception of Madame L——, a most talkative old creature, whose long-winded stories began to get on my nerves. I had no cause whatever for suspicion, yet I could not help inquiring from the police commissary in her district who she was.

"Oh," he said laughingly, "she is all right. Her husband is employed in a big establishment, and they are very well off."

In the quarter, too, Madame L—— bore a good reputation.

For all that, the woman seemed to haunt me, and I paid her another visit to ask for further information. This time she gave me the description of a mysterious personage, who, she said, often came to see Madame Bazire, a poorly dressed man, easily recognizable by a huge bag hanging from his shoulders by a strap.

It took me several days to hunt up this individual. I traced him to the Notre Dame des Victoires church, waited till he came out, and asked him to conduct me to his house. Without uttering a word, he took me to Batignolles, to a queer-looking room, where he and his brother lived.

I confess that, although I considered myself case-hardened as regards surprises, I stared with astonishment when I beheld that room, while a pungent smell nearly choked me. In the corner the brother was bending over a small stove cooking a miserable stew, their evening meal. But the strange odor emanated from hundreds of pairs of old boots and shoes, piled up everywhere, dirty and covered with mildew.

Quietly, with an almost touching simplicity, these two men informed me that they knew Madame Bazire very well indeed—a charitable, kind lady, who helped them in the good work they were doing. One of them had been to see her on the morning before the murder, and not on the day itself, as Madame L—— had asserted.

And then these two quaint fellows told me the extraordinary life they led. The elder brother was messenger in a big shop and both, fanatically religious, not only lived on that humble salary, but managed to put a little money aside, with which they bought old boots and shoes, and sold them at fairs. The profits they derived from these transactions they gave to a charitable institution in aid of abandoned children. Their only joy in life was to pray, and to assist those poorer than themselves!

A subsequent inquiry showed that these men had nothing to do with the crime, and I am not ashamed to own that, despite my anxiety to trace the culprit, I was glad these two quaint philanthropists were innocent.

I next discovered that Madame Bazire had a niece, whom she had not seen for a long time because that young person did not go regularly to mass. This niece was engaged to a youth, a kind of butcher, who sold horse-flesh in the Paris streets. His reputation was anything but good.

I have always been averse to arresting a person on mere suspicion. But here, without any clue to work upon, I departed from my principle, and ordered one of my men to bring the man to my office.

He looked so scared, and contradicted himself so much, that had he been arraigned there and then before a jury, they would unhesitatingly have found him guilty. Moreover, he had a very unclean record, and two circumstances looked most suspicious: First, he, who the day before the murder did not possess a cent, now had, when searched, two gold pieces in his pocket. And, second, he was carrying a little parcel containing linen and some fancy material, in every way similar to the bundles found at Madame Bazire's.

At first he would not explain whence came the money and the parcel, and finally said that in the tram-car he had "met one of his former sweethearts—cook in a "swell house"—who had given him the forty francs and the linen.

The story seemed all the more incredible as he pretended to be ignorant of the name and address of this generous woman.

"All I know," he declared, "is that she is called Adele, and is in service in a house near the Arc de Triomphe."

It was the same childish and improbable story of most criminals.

"I think we made a good haul, sir," said the inspector who had arrested him.

"That is not my opinion," I replied; "he may be a bad egg, but I doubt whether he has anything to do with this business."

My inspector looked surprised.

"But, excuse me, sir," he insisted; "what about the two coins, and especially the linen? And his cock-and-bull story of not knowing who gave them to him? He doesn't look like a man who received so many presents that he cannot remember the addresses or even the names of the donors."

"Yes, I know; it seems very suspicious," I retorted, "but there are things that escaped your notice. When he was brought here, not knowing what was wanted from him, he appeared very agitated, for, with a large collection of misdeeds on his conscience, he was trying to think which of his performances had come to light. I carefully watched his fingers—it is a habit I have—and they were twitching nervously. The moment he heard that I sent for him in connection with the Bazire murder his face retained the scared expression, but his fingers became calm, as if to say, 'We had no hand in this affair,' and his fingers, I am sure, spoke the truth."

The next day I had to release the man from custody. Ten trustworthy witnesses proved that he had spent the day, and even the night, of the murder at Neuilly.

And the incredible came true. We actually found the fellow's former sweetheart. The woman was in service near the Arc de Triomphe, and, having met him accidentally, had given him the money and a bundle of material for curtains.

A fresh clue had to be found. I was losing patience, and returned to Vincennes, where I carefully examined every nook and corner. I discovered nothing that could put me on a direct track, but I had the absolute conviction that revenge or some other mysterious reason had brought the murderer to the house. Robbery was out of the question.

I tried to learn more about Madame L——, and discovered that she had disliked Madame Bazire because of her bigotry, and her deplorable habit of dragging the old trunk along the floor—the trunk the murderer had placed on her back. Madame Bazire kept her prayer-books in that box, and Madame L——, whose apartment was just underneath, used to complain of hearing continually a "tram-car pass above her head." Madame L——, I also learned, was most excitable, and apt to quarrel with her neighbors.

But all this was not sufficient to connect her with the crime, and I already began to fear that my prejudice against Madame L—— had no foundation, when my suspicions were once more aroused by one or two trifling circumstances, which decided me to pay her another visit. I would have liked to search the place, but, unfortunately, this was out of the question; there was no excuse for such a proceeding. Madame L——, on the other hand, roundly abused me because I reproached her for having put me twice on the wrong scent.

I went home quite disheartened. The business weighed on my mind, and when I went to bed I could not sleep, because I was trying to discover what possible motive Madame L—— might have had to kill the widow Bazire. I found no solution to this riddle, and yet I felt convinced that this talkative woman, who twice had led me astray, had committed the murder. But what had prompted her?

Tired out, I slept, and then I had a strange vision. I fancied I saw Madame Bazire's bedroom, with its banners, its Virgins, its Saint Josephs, on the walls. I saw the poor old lady returning from mass, carrying her prayer-book under her arm. She was out of breath, having mounted the stairs. She sat down on a chair, and after a while rose, opened her door, and, seizing the trunk, dragged it along the floor.

All at once a woman, a fury, rushed into the room, swinging a rope in her right hand.

"I am sick of your psalm-singing tricks," she shouted. "You shall no longer wake me up with your tramway, you old pig!"

And rushing at Madame Basire, who had not the strength to utter a cry, she threw the rope around her neck and pulled upon it with all her might.

A rattling noise, and all was over—Madame Bazire was dead.

The fury turned around, and I recognized Madame L——. She looked a moment at her victim and burst into a loud, insane laugh:

"There is your trunk, you psalm-singing idiot. You will not worry me again with it!"

I heard the noise of the little rollers, and saw the creature throw the heavy trunk on Madame Bazire's lifeless body.

Madame L—— stood for a moment motionless; she then opened the hall door to see whether any one was in sight, and, walking up to the fireplace, took down the heavy clock, hid it beneath her apron, and stole out of the room, softly closing the door.

I awoke with a start, perspiration running down my face. A cold bath restored me, but my dream remained in my memory in its minutest details.

I took a sheet of paper and wrote down, as if it had been the scenario of a drama, my report to the examining magistrate. It was dark at six o'clock in the morning when I rang the bell at M. Guillot's, who, of course, was still in bed and surprised at my calling at such an early hour.

"Monsieur Guillot," I said, "I now know how Madame Bazire was assassinated. Listen."

And I read him my report, or, rather, the story of my dream.

"Yes," he said, when I had finished, "your conclusions are perfectly logical; the crime undoubtedly has been committed in the manner you say. But your conviction and mine are not sufficient to allow us to arrest this woman and commit her for trial. I share your opinion that Madame L——, whose mind seems deranged, has strangled the widow. Where, however, are the proofs?"

"If only I could find that clock!" I groaned, "and it is impossible for me to lay my hands on it unless I turn Madame L——'s apartment upside down, always supposing that she has not hidden it somewhere else."

"You are clever enough to unearth that clock without searching the apartment," laughed M. Guillot, "but unearth it you must."

As Madame L—— had taken a dislike to me I could not attempt to approach her. I, therefore, sent for Barbaste, one of my inspectors, and gave him my instructions. Barbaste had a curious specialty—that of making criminals confess. His affable manner impressed them, and when he gravely shook his head and remarked: "Yes, I know provocation is a terrible thing," the culprits would turn to this sympathetic friend and say how they had committed their crime, under such strong provocation that no right-minded jury could convict them. And they would pour out their whole story into Barbaste's attentive ear.

Of course I did not mention to Barbaste a word of my dream, and only gave him a sketch of how I thought the murder had been committed.

"You must," I said, "induce Madame L—— to confess, and try all you can to make her show you where she hid the clock."

Like all dreams, mine had been incomplete, for I had attempted to remember where the timepiece might have been stowed away.

When he reached Vincennes he found Madame L—— in bed. She was ill and greatly excited.

"Are you coming to bother me again with this stupid affair?" she began angrily.

"No, no, my dear lady," replied Barbaste soothingly.

And, taking a chair close to her bed, he added:

"I have only come to see you on a small matter."

"What matter?"

"Yes," continued Barbaste, "I was thinking all along of what you had done, and wondering how I would have acted if some one had continually been rolling a noisy trunk over my head."

The mad creature sat up in bed, and her eyes grew large.

"My good fellow," she cried, "I soon settled that little business."

"Quite so," said the imperturbable Barbaste; "but what have you done with the clock?"

"The clock?" she shouted, shaking with laughter, "why it is here, under my bed!"

And there it was, and very well hidden, too, for she had managed to squeeze it inside the mattress.

An hour later Barbaste brought Madame L—— to my office, where in a disconnected manner she gave me all the details of the crime.

"At last," she cried, "I can sleep quietly, since that old psalm-singer is dead. Every morning and every night on her return from mass I heard her rolling her beastly trunk. I had to kill her! On the previous day I had received a parcel bound with some strong cord. 'All right,' I said to myself, 'that will just do nicely to strangle her.' As usual, I was awakened by the noise of the trunk. The old woman had come back from church. I jumped out of bed, ran upstairs, threw her on the floor, and twisted the cord around her neck."

She remained a moment silent, and then, with an uncanny laugh, resumed:

"It was as easy as possible. She did not utter a sound. A child of six could have done it."

"And then," she yelled, her eyes darting flames, "and then I took her trunk, her dirty trunk, and threw it on her back, calling out: 'You will never bother me again with that, you old pig!' I also took away her clock, the dirty clock she liked so much, and I shrieked into her ear: 'You will never hear that strike any more.'"

She fell back in her chair exhausted, and I remained speechless. My dream, my whole dream, had proved true!

As to Madame L——, she required doctors, not judges. She was sent to La Salpetriere in the ward of Professor Vigouroux.

She is still in a criminal lunatic asylum.

GETTING MISTLETOE FROM OKLAHOMA

Doubtless many people while purchasing their Yuletide decorations have often wondered whence come the immense supplies of mistletoe which must be required to fill the great demand for it during the holiday season in the cities and towns of those states too far north for that parasitic growth to thrive, says F. J. Sherman in Country Life in America.

Among many of the people native to the states north of Kansas and Missouri who have never taken the trouble to look the matter up a sort of general idea prevails that mistletoe is to be found only at rare intervals, after a diligent search, and then on oak trees, with only a few sprigs growing in a place.

The traveler visiting Oklahoma City, capital of the new state of Oklahoma, during the winter time and, taking a walk out to Wheeler park, which is situated in the southwest part of the town, will have this idea quickly dispelled from his mind, for at even a considerable distance from the park his attention will be drawn to the strange appearance which the trees present at that season of the year, when the leaves are off and the mistletoe thrives on every branch.

In the summer time, when the leaves are on the trees, the mistletoe cannot be seen unless it is specially looked for, and then it appears to be almost a part of the natural foliage of the tree upon which it is growing.

Contrary to general belief, mistletoe is rarely found on oak trees and in Oklahoma is nearly always found on swamp or water elms, which are generally seen growing in lowlands and along river banks. Here it thrives luxuriantly.

There is but one species usually found in Oklahoma out of the 400 odd species known to exist, most of which are found in tropical countries and are parasitic in nature.

In Oklahoma two or three weeks before Christmas the annual mistletoe harvest is gathered—generally by boys who don't mind the dangerous and risky job of climbing into all sizes of trees after it—and brought to town, where it is packed in barrels and boxes and shipped to the northern cities and towns, where, along with the holly and evergreen, it finds a place in those happy homes which have not forgotten the good old custom of decorating in honor of the glad Christmastide.

NO CHANCE FOR SPEEDERS

An Oregon Sheriff Has Remarkable Success With a Wire and Stop-Watch.

With a long piece of copper wire, batteries, a buzzer and stop-watch, Deputy Sheriff Allen Hart and assistants have become the bugaboo of motorists of Hood county who are prone to speed above the twenty-five miles an hour limit on the county highways.

The officer has measured the piece of copper wire used for his operations in detecting the speeders. He stands at one end with his watch and the aid at the other. When a machine passes the aid he presses the buzzer and Hart starts his stop-watch, catching the time as the machine passes his end of the wire. In case the car is going the other way, Hart sets his stop mechanism on his watch to work and catches the time when the buzzer is sounded from the other end.

Thomas Carlyle on Belief.

A man lives by believing something. Belief I define to be the healthy act of a man's mind. It is a mysterious, indescribable process, that of getting to believe; indescribable as all vital acts are.

We have our mind given us, not that it may cavil and argue, but that it may see into something, give us clear belief and understanding about something, whereon we are then to proceed to act.—Thomas Carlyle.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Young Women Take Wild Ride When Rein Breaks

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind.—Miss Grace Mockford and Miss Edith Timmerman, 3037 North Illinois street, were tempted outdoors by the delightful weather the other afternoon for what they planned to be a very restful and bracing drive over the boulevards.

At Capitol avenue, near Ohio street, the animal made a break, and immediately afterward things began to happen. In fact, things happened on Capitol avenue all the way north to Twentieth street, which is quite a distance. The two young women thought it was quite a distance, at least, and they never expect to drive through that thoroughfare in quite so dramatic a fashion again.

When the horse found that one of the reins had parted he knew at once that the other was of no service, for he was a wise horse. He started to run, and made up his mind at the very beginning to pay no attention to speed laws or interference of other kinds. Pedestrians ran out and tried to seize the bridle, but he paid no attention to them. Persons in other rigs tried to overtake him, but he left them far behind.

Finally, when the horse had passed Nineteenth street, a young man ran out, sizing up the situation as he ran. He saw that to tackle the front end of the runaway would be like plunging single-handed against a flying wedge; so he stood alongside and, as the rear end of the buggy passed, he seized the top and vaulted into the vehicle. After that he climbed over the seat, over the dashboard, over the shafts and onto the horse's back. With so much accomplished the remainder was easy. All he had to do was to reach over and catch hold of the rings on the ends of the bits and then jerk a few times.

Loses His Money at Old "Odd Man Wins" Game

KANSAS CITY, Mo.—It may be that A. E. Peyton immolated himself as a sacrifice on the altar of Protection of Fall Guys the other morning. If so, he did it without knowing it.

Peyton came to town from Hugo, Okla., accompanied by some money and reserve funds in the shape of a couple of express money orders for $50 each. He immediately started out to see the sights. He got as far as Ninth and Main streets when he saw a stranger, who looked him over slightly and then introduced himself as Frank Kent.

They talked and walked. Finally the conversation got steered around to the subject of gambling. By that time, as coincidence would have it—or maybe it was Kent—they had reached the bluff that overlooks the depot. And right there appeared another stranger. Anyway, he was strange to Peyton, and Kent didn't seem to know him, either.

Then they got to matching dollars.

Now, it is an established scientific principle that when two expert matchers collaborate to "trim" a tertium quid, or third person, the T. Q. inevitably gets trimmed. The process is painfully simple. The game is "odd man wins." The two collaborators so arrange it that when one has "heads" the other has "tails," or vice versa. So one of them always wins.

EASY
I BELIEVE I'VE BEEN SKINNED ???

In the space of thirty hectic minutes, the man from Oklahoma had been separated from $28 in money and the two express money orders; total $138.

But the man from Oklahoma felt a trifle resentful. It even occurred to him that something had been done to him. So he just walked along behind the stranger called Kent until he saw a policeman. Then he had Kent arrested.

Effective Car-Stop Scream Introduced by Child

ST. LOUIS, Mo.—Passengers on a crowded Hodiamont car about 12:30 p. m. the other day were greatly alarmed by a child's piercing screams as the car began to move after a stop at Clara avenue.

Men and women who had been lucky enough to secure seats sprang to their feet and struggled for a view of the rear platform, from whence the shrieks came.

A rush which might have resulted in a panic was averted only because the congested condition of the car precluded any rushing.

As the shrieks rang out the conductor grabbed the bell rope and gave the motorman the "stop-quick" signal.

The crew and passengers alike waited breathlessly to learn the cause of alarm.

Male passengers, smoking on the rear platform, performed the seemingly impossible and cleared a passage to the steps, through which walked a matron leading a girl about seven years of age, from whose eyes the tears were welling.

"Ain't you ashamed of yourself?" the woman was demanding.

"They were leaving you behind," the child sobbed.

As the car moved on again those passengers nearest the steps explained the situation.

The woman and the child, presumably her daughter, were running to catch the car. Youth led in the race, and the child boarded the car first. The woman was several yards behind, and the conductor did not see her and gave the signal to start the car before she had boarded it. The near-kidnaping, which then was threatened, was prevented by the child's effective if unusual method of stopping the car. She just screamed.

Newsboy Police to Keep Order Among Fellows

SPRINGFIELD, Mass.—The Springfield Newsboys' association has organized a police force to patrol the business section of the city to see that the "newsies" conduct themselves properly and also that their rights are not infringed upon. Solomon Skvirsky, president of the association and "chief of police" ex-officio, has appointed a sergeant and patrolman for each ward.

Young Skvirsky came to this country from Russia when four and one-half years old, and since he was seven years old he has earned his own living by selling newspapers. He is the most important person in Springfield in the eyes of the 600 newsboys of the city, among whom his decrees are law.

Gambling and petty thieving are two evils which the newsboys' leader has worked to suppress. "Our organization has stopped much of the gambling that formerly went on here to quite an extent among the boys," said Skvirsky, in speaking of the association. "The gambling habit with newsboys probably starts from seeing older boys who hang around the streets play games of chance.

"Mr. Slor, a councilor of the association and a former president of the Chicago Newsboys' association, put before a meeting of our association an ingenious plan for a newsboys' police squad. We adopted his idea and divided Main street, the newsboys' principal source of revenue, into wards, each policed by newsboys.

"The duties of these officers are to see that there is no trouble among the boys and to report upon conditions at the meetings of the association. Some things that have been regulated are hold-ups, shooting pennies and craps."

STARTS PLAN FOR MODEL DANCE HALLS

This is the verdict of Mrs. Charles H. Israels, who is known by reputation to every dancing hall proprietor in New York. As chairman of the committee of amusement resources for working girls, Mrs. Israels has made a detailed study of the dance hall problem for the last four years. With a committee of seventeen, she has investigated dance halls of every type and in every district; she has secured legislation resulting in the dance hall license act of 1910, and as an evidence of her belief that the supervised dance can be made to pay she has started plans for a series of model dance halls in all the larger eastern cities.

Mrs. Israels and her committee are at present making vigorous efforts to drive the "turkey trot" and its popular companions from the field and substitute a less objectionable style of dancing, but the popularity of those figures makes the task difficult.

"If the public could be made to realize," said Mrs. Israels, "that a large share of the amusement available for young girls of the poorer classes in New York city, a great army of them, is in the hands of organized gangs, the importance of the problem would be brought home to them."

PERU'S PRESIDENT OF ENGLISH DESC[illegible]

Doubtless with a view to the opening of the Panama Canal no country in western South America is doing a finer stunt of advertising than Peru, with an immense coast line on the Pacific ocean extending from Ecuador on the north to Bolivia and the aggressive state of Chili on the south. The new trade opportunities should be of great interest to Pittsburgh.

Peruvian newspapers have just arrived giving an account of the inauguration of Guillermo Eduardo Billinghurst as president of the Peruvian republic, and it is something of a story in view of the near inauguration of another president of the United States. While President Billinghurst is a native Peruvian, having been born at Arlo in 1851, he is a scion of one of the oldest real English families, tracing his lineage to Adam de Billinghurst, who was given a manor of that name by William the Conqueror. While native to the country, he is the first Englishman to be elected to a presidency in any of the Latin republics. This has been a matter of comment to some extent, but the story of the inauguration has had no more than a passing mention in papers outside of Peru.

CALLS CHINA A NEW UNITED STATES

"So many of us Chinese republicans, graduates of American colleges, are Americans through and through, that, in the intervals of fighting against the imperialists at Nanking, we actually discussed football like any other American college men."

So says Ching-Chun Wang, M. A., Ph. D., Yale '08, veteran of the battles that overthrew the oldest empire in the world, now back in this country as a member of the fifth international congress of chambers of commerce, held in Boston. Also, he is associate director of the Peking-Mukden railway. A man of many titles—titles hard to remember. But there is no difficulty in remembering Dr. Wang's words when he talks about the new China. He is an enthusiast, a sayer of startling things, a describer of conditions that you would not imagine possible in the phlegmatic east, a prophet of the fire of his enthusiasm, still appear so nearly incredible as to make you gasp.

"The new China is a new United States," he declares; and he certainly makes plenty of convincing statements to prove his contention.

JOHN SINGLETON MOSBY REPORTED ILL

News from Washington of the serious illness of Col. John S. Mosby brings into prominence again one of the few remaining prominent officers of the army of the Confederacy. Colonel Mosby stood in the front rank of Confederate raiders in the Civil War, being particularly harassing in the 1854 campaign of General Sheridan in the Shenandoah valley which ended with his brilliant victory at Cedar Creek. There was a long line of communication to be guarded from Baltimore to Harper's Ferry and then down the valley, and from Washington by way of Manassas and Front Royal. Colonel Mosby devoted himself to breaking these lines and raiding his enemy's forces wherever possible. No one else in the army was so anathematized as was he. That such a rebel against the government could not only have escaped with his life after the surrender, but should actually later have been appointed to office under the government he sought to destroy, will always be one of the marvels of history.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Navy to Test Battleships With Corrugated Hulls

WASHINGTON.—Corrugated battleships will be the subject of tests this winter by Naval Constructor David W. Taylor, on duty in the bureau of construction and repair, in the naval testing tank at the Washington yard. Four vessels for the merchant service have been built in England on this plan. Two outward curves, 23 inches deep, run the length of the ships between the load line and the bilge. Between the convex curves is a concave surface of equal depth. This partial application of the tube principle greatly increases the strength of the hull. So much strength is added that the stringer plates may be dispensed with. This increases the space available for bulk cargo. In addition, however, it is said that the corrugated hull saves fuel and lessens the effect of waves on the steadiness of the ship.

English reports indicate that a corrugated hull will save 16 per cent. in fuel over the cost of driving a smooth hull of equal displacement. Two models, of equal weight and dimensions, each about twenty feet long, will be constructed here, one with a corrugated and the other with a plain hull. Each will be attached to the traveling crane which spans the experimental tank at the Washington navy yard, and the resistance of the models to the water when pulled at a given rate of speed will be accurately registered on the delicate gauges attached to the crane. If the corrugated hull presents less resistance to the water the fact will be instantly indicated on the gauges. No vessel of this type has yet been constructed in this country. The first corrugated vessel was built in England in 1909.

Postal Deposit Savings Show Average of $86

POSTMASTER General Frank H. Hitchcock made public the other day the latest available figures showing that the deposits in postal savings depositories have now reached the sum of $28,000,000. The system was inaugurated January 3, 1911, but most of the deposits have been made within the last year.

The deposits represent 290,000 individuals, making an average of $86 per depositor. The system is now operated in 12,773 postoffices, in every one of the forty-eight states, including 644 branch postoffices.

According to the figures compiled by the controller of the currency the total amount of the deposits in the savings banks of the country in 1911 was $4,212,583,598. This amount was deposited in 1,884 banks by 9,794,647 individual depositors, and the average savings bank account for each depositor was $430.09. Comparison of these statistics shows that the average amount held by each savings bank depositor was about five times the average amount held by each postal savings bank depositor.

According to the report of the controller of the currency, the postal savings bank of the United Kingdom in 1910 held $112,668,560, out of a grand total of $1,070,265,509 in private and postal savings banks. In round numbers the postal savings deposits in the United States are about one-half of one per cent. of the combined deposits in postal depositories and savings banks, while in the United Kingdom the postal savings constitute about 1½ per cent. of the combined deposits in private and postal savings banks.

FINE
POSTAL SAVINGS NOW $28,000,000 AVERAGE $86 PER DEPOSITOR

In France, according to the latest available figures, the postal savings in 1909 aggregated $316,456,866, or an average of about $57 for each depositor.

Postmaster General Hitchcock's figures show that 7,357 banks have qualified to receive postal savings funds.

Army Officers on Detached Duty to Be Removed

ARMY OFFICERS MUST RETURN TO THEIR REGIMENTS

IT is now estimated at the war department that more than 50 per cent. of all army officers now on detached service will have to be removed from their present posts at once, owing to legislation by congress during the last session. This means that more than half of the officers now serving as military attaches at American legations and embassies abroad, as instructors in the military academy at West Point, as instructors in the Army Service schools, as instructors of state militia organizations and as instructors in various military academies in foreign military schools will be ordered back to their regiments.

The law, as one officer put it, is "excessively mandatory," inasmuch as it requires that any officer responsible for a failure to obey it to the full shall forfeit his pay and allowances. Consequently every officer who has not served at least two of the last six years in command of troops will have to return to his regiment before December 15. It has also been found by the law officers of the war department that about a third more of the officers on detached service will have to be removed within six months. A large number of officers on detached duty in Washington are caught pretty severely by this order.

It is said that there are officers who have not been with their commands for years, as they have had pull enough to keep them in easy jobs here in Washington, where they can do their stunts and not half try, and fill in the rest of the time doing society acts.

Washington society without its army and navy officers is mighty slow. There has always been feminine influence to keep plenty of the young men on detached duty in Washington.

Spanish Minister Rejoices in Fifty Suits, Etc.

IT was stated in an authentic quarter the other day that the Spanish minister, Senor Don Juan Riano, has 50 suits of clothes and a correspondingly large number of accessories. Spacious and perfectly equipped quarters are required to accommodate this wardrobe, and in selecting the new legation special attention was paid to this feature.

The present legation, in New Hampshire avenue, has commodious dressing rooms and closets for each suite, but such an outfit as Senor Riano's in order to be easily handled and accessible has to have a room to itself, and, if possible, one built for the purpose.

The garments are classified, and that they may be easily found an inventory is fastened on the door. According to the most advanced authorities "wet" and "dry" rooms are necessary for the complete wardrobe. The "wet" room removes the creases and takes the place of sponging; the "dry" room hardens the costume in the lines it has taken.

Whether Senor Riano's new home is provided with all these comforts is not known, but that every means has been adopted to keep the minister the "best dressed man in town," as he was considered in Paris when connected with the Spanish embassy there, is certain.

And it may be mentioned in this connection that as much care is exercised in the selection and proper preservation of the so-called "accessories" as in the actual suits. These "accessories" include many articles of personal adornment little known to the ordinary man, but are considered absolutely necessary in mind of the Spanish Don.

NEEDLESS NOISES.

It is possible to have a big town and a prosperous town without making so powerful much fuss about it. There is a large amount of unnecessary din about everyday traffic. To begin with, we build a lot of our streets out of brick and granite when we might just as well construct them of material that is less productive of noise and less calculated to bring wagons and other vehicles to a state of premature debility and disrepair, says the Louisville Courier-Journal. Then we tolerate all sorts of nuisances that ought not to be tolerated in a civilized community for the simple reason that "everybody's business is nobody's business," and everybody is so absorbed in looking after his own personal affairs that he has neither time nor inclination to do much for the general comfort and welfare. Possibly about seven-tenths of the noise incident to city existence could be subtracted without any especial detriment to the progress of industry and commerce and the ordinary transaction of business, and with undoubted relief and pleasure to persons of superabundant nerve and others who delight in the quiet life. Under such conditions the average city, however, would lose its attractions for that more self-assertive element of humanity which revels in racket and believes in "whooping it up" all along the line.

It is interesting to learn from the seat of war that the experiment of using the aeroplane in war operations was tried at Adrianople with a result which went a little further than predicted. Lieutenant Popoff, aviator with the Bulgarian forces, made a flight not for the purpose of attack by dropping bombs, but to view and report on the disposition of the Turkish forces, says the Pittsburg Dispatch. In doing so he got within the Turkish line of fire, and a shot from the Turkish cannon killed him and wrecked his machine. Much attention has been given, especially in Europe, to devising means to repel aeroplane attacks. Army squads have been trained in firing at kites, and specially mounted rapid-fire guns have been invented. But at Adrianople an ordinary field gun loaded with shrapnel was sufficient for the purpose. This gives a hint of what could be done with guns of longer range, specially adapted to the purpose, in the line of repelling aeroplane bomb-dropping attacks.

The London Sphere asserts that there is a national awakening to the persistence of ancient errors in the training of boys in the public elementary schools. It is now seen, the Sphere says, that to teach a boy reading, writing and arithmetic only and to dismiss him from school at fourteen or younger without further training either of his hands or his mind is suicidal for the boy and for the nation, too, inasmuch as boys thus brought up ultimately tend to swell the ranks of adult nondescript labor, of the unemployable, or even of hooligans. The Sphere praises the results which have been achieved by technical training schools where boys are taught manual crafts, and, after a thorough course, are watched for three years with a view of seeing how far they win out in the battle of life. The careers of these trained boys are said to be very encouraging.

It is remarkable under what difficulties the crusade for fire prevention, which is one of the leading issues of the day, is being pushed. No danger is greater, more horrible nor more imminent than that of fire, yet the apathy of the average person to means of protection from this worst of the elements is little short of marvelous. The majority go on, inviting destruction by living in the conditions of fire traps, and resenting all interference with this criminal carelessness, trusting to luck that the danger so courted will not come to pass. With cordial co-operation with the efforts of the authorities in the matter of this defence, the large cities could be made practically almost fireproof.

Now, to realize universal peace, why not send the fool that rocks the boat, the practical joker, and the nuisance who plasters newlyweds with signs, out hunting with the fellow who mistakes the guide for a deer and the fool who didn't know it was loaded?

A Boston divine advises a young man to walk across his best girl's carpet with muddy feet, and if she smiles to marry her. He might get a good natured wife, but her housekeeping would be a little off color.

The Los Angeles council endorsed an action whereby men are allowed to carry nippers to clip off the ends of offending hatpins. Many theatergoers wish that scissors would be included to trim the plumage.

RINES AS SPEAKER

MORA MAN CLEVERLY GAINS A VICTORY OVER HIS OPPONENTS.

RIVALS ACKNOWLEDGE IT

Lundeen's Attitude Indicates Fight for Progressive Organization May Go on Regardless of Result.

St. Paul.—Henry Rines of Mora is the successful candidate for the speakership of the next house.

A clever coup was perpetrated by the Rines forces by which the entire Republican delegation of Ramsey was lined up for Mr. Rines. This gave the Mora man 68 votes.

All of the opposition candidates recognizing the futility of further opposition withdrew from the race, leaving a clear field for Mr. Rines. The First district caucused at Rochester.

Mr. Rines felt extremely gratified over the result and said: "It has been a clean fight and absolutely no pledges have been made to any one. I feel very gratified over the action of my opponents in withdrawing from the fight at this time and thus bringing about a more harmonious situation."

Losers Take It Cheerfully.

Both P. H. McGary and G. W. Brown appeared early in the lobby of the Merchants hotel, showing themselves cheerful losers.

"I recognize that Mr. Rines has a majority of the members pledged to him," said Mr. McGary, "and I withdraw from the fight. As the choice of the majority of the house I shall seek to co-operate with Mr. Rines in every way possible for the best interests of the state. I have no regrets over the outcome. I have received some loyal support and am grateful for that. It is with a sincere feeling of relief that the responsibility of the speakership will not be upon my shoulders. I would have appreciated the honor, but I have realized all along that it is a position full of grief and trouble."

Splendid Victory Admitted.

Garfield W. Brown of Glencoe was an equally cheerful and equally game loser.

"It is all over," said Mr. Brown, "and I am feeling extremely comfortable over the result. Mr. Rines has won a splendid victory and there is nothing but the best of feeling in my heart towards him. We can now interest ourselves in framing the legislation that should be passed this winter."

Lundeen to Fight on Alone.

Ernest Lundeen of Minneapolis also recognized that Mr. Rines had carried off the palm of victory, but Mr. Lundeen maintains that he will not go into the caucus, but will continue his fight alone for what he regards as Progressive principles. He said:

"Reliable information reaches me that Representative Rines has the unanimous indorsement of the Ramsey Republican delegation, which, added to the solid Ninth and heavy support in all but the Third district, gives Mr. Rines the lead in the Republican caucus and also on the floor of the house by seven votes. I congratulate my successful opponent and wish him a successful administration. The neatness and dispatch with which he put through his program speaks well for his executive ability.

"Personally, I have no regrets to offer. The men, however, who put aside outworn ideas and sacrificed committees, chairmanships and employes to follow me, without hesitation along more modern lines, have my sincere thanks. I release them from all pledges, to vote as they think best; as for me, I will join in no caucus or click combine. I am fighting for principle. Two years ago I fought the canonized rules alone, and if necessary I am not afraid to stand alone now."

Mr. Lundeen's attitude indicates that, while the election of Mr. Rines as speaker is acknowledged, the fight for organization of the house along more progressive lines may be continued.

Result of Clever Moves.

The victory of Mr. Rines is the result of a series of clever moves, starting with the secret caucus held recently in Minneapolis. At that time Representatives Rines, Nolan, Holmberg, Frankson, Johnson and Ofsthen, who had been mentioned as candidates for speaker, brought as many of their friends as possible into the caucus, and after balloting decided upon Rines as their candidate. The hand-wagon movement thus started carried Rines over. There is considerable mystery about the Ramsey county action which finally clinched Mr. Rines' choice as speaker.

Young Trapper Drowned.

Frazee.—Edward, aged 22, son of Martin Koplin, of Vergas, was drowned while trapping along the shore of Leon lake, near that village. He started on skates across the lake, when he went through an airhole and did not appear again. Had not an old man who was living in a cabin on an island felt some strange impulse to go to his door it would perhaps never have been known what became of the lad, as the man had just reached the door when he saw the young fellow sink from sight.

NAME FARM SCHOOL BUILDINGS

BOOSTERS OF NORTHERN MINNESOTA AT EXERCISES.

J. J. Hill Praises Red River Valley Amid Great Applause—Many at Banquet.

Crookston.—On the eve of the greatest day in its history, members of the Northern Minnesota Development association mingled in dedicatory and building-naming exercises at the Northwest school of agriculture here attended by some of the state's biggest men, including James J. Hill, who came in a special train; Dr. George E. Vincent, president of the University of Minnesota; B. F. Nelson, Minneapolis, president of the university board of regents; Dean Woods and others.

Hill Given a Big Ovation.

At the naming of the new agricultural building in his honor, Mr. Hill was applauded until he held up his hands for silence, but hand clapping frequently interrupted his remarks, especially his tribute to the soil of the Red River valley.

"There is no other place of equal area that possesses as much wealth as the Red River valley," said Mr. Hill. "Once I said every acre was worth $50; I made a mistake—it is worth $100."

Mr. Hill made a strong plea for the teaching of domestic science to girls. "Most of the wrecked homes and most of the divorces are caused because the girl has not been properly trained in domestic duties."

Refers to Woods' Controversy.

Mr. Hill referred indirectly to his recent controversy with Dean Woods, relative to the standing of the agricultural college.

"If the agricultural college is not what it should be, or agricultural teaching in the state is not what it should be, the people have only themselves to blame," said Mr. Hill.

The school's farm engineering and dairy building was officially given the name of Sidney M. Owen hall, and in tendering the name Professor T. L. Haecker of St. Paul referred to Mr. Owen as the originator of advanced education in Minnesota. Hugh J. Hughes of Minneapolis responded.

The administration building was given the name of David L. Kiehle building, Fred B. Snyder responding for Mr. Kiehle, now a resident of Portland, Ore. The girls' dormitory was named William Robertson hall. Mrs. Robertson made the response.

Pledges Best Services of "U."

The new agricultural building was next dedicated, following which Mr. Hill spoke. C. G. Selvig presided. One of the three speeches made by President George Edgar Vincent of the University of Minnesota was made at this meeting. He pledged the best services of the university to an extension of agricultural education.

All these meetings were incidental to the development association's convention, and the delegates attended in a body, being taken to the experiment station in a special train.

In the evening the state served a banquet at the farm school, attended by 300 persons. Toasts were responded to by A. J. McGuire of the North Central state farm at Grand Rapids, who pleaded for Americans to "stop going away to live under a foreign flag when you can do better by coming to Northeast Minnesota;" E. C. Higbe, superintendent of the state farm school at Morris; A. A. Miller, Crookston; John Dwang, Two Harbors; J. J. Hill and President Vincent. Dr. Vincent's toast was to "The University."

JUDGE ELLIOTT RESIGNS.

Former Minneapolis Jurist's Retirement From Island Commission Surprises His Friends.

Minneapolis.—Judge Charles B. Elliott, who was formerly of Minneapolis, member of the Philippine commission and secretary of police and commerce for the Philippine island, has resigned his position with the government. Judge Elliott's resignation was announced from Washington, D. C., and is a complete surprise to his Minneapolis friends. He was in Minneapolis recently and said then that if Woodrow Wilson were elected president he probably would lose his Philippine position.

Plan to Build Interurban.

Thief River Falls.—At a meeting of citizens it was decided to proceed with the construction of the proposed electric railway from this city to the eastern country, some twenty-five miles towards the woods in Beltrami county. This territory is well settled and supports a good population of farmers who have no market place nearer than Thief River Falls. To care for the heavy business incident to this territory a company has been launched and the right of way secured and the capital necessary for the enterprise has been assured.

To Conduct Stearns County Fair.

Sauk Center.—The Agricultural society of Stearns county, at its annual meeting here, elected the following officers: President, J. N. McGibbon; vice president, J. B. Schoenhoff; secretary, B. F. Du Bois; corresponding secretary, M. D. Aygarn; treasurer A. F. Strebel; board of directors, G. Hillerud, J. A. Brown, H. F. Hennemann, S. F. Merryman and J. A. Schoenhoff. The secretary's report showed receipts for the year of $5,721.65 and disbursements of $5,700.77.

STEAMER AGROUND

TUGS RUSHED TO AID OF THE EASTON—BOAT NOT BADLY DAMAGED.

DENSE FOG IS TO BLAME

Stranded Vessel Expected to Be Floated Within a Few Hours —Size of the Ship.

Duluth, Minn., Dec. 6.—The steamer Easton, of the Booth line, went hard ashore 35 miles from Port Arthur, Ontario, Lake Superior.

None of the passengers was injured, it is said. Tugs immediately were sent from Port Arthur to its aid.

The Easton carries wireless, and it later reported that it was in seed and not badly damaged. The tugs, according to the wireless operator aboard the Easton, are taking off the passengers, while a lighter has been sent from Port Arthur to remove the Easton's cargo. The stranded vessel probably will be floated within a few hours.

A heavy fog hung over Lake Superior all morning, and the Easton went ashore, according to report, at half speed.

The Easton is of 460 tons displacement, is 155 feet long and 30 foot beam. It runs between Duluth and Port Arthur, Ont.

Rumors Persistent.

Rumors of heavy loss of life on the vessel are persistent, but the local manager of the line, Louis T. Hogstad, says that so far as he has learned all of the fifty members of the crew and passenger list are safe.

The wind was blowing from the north in the Port Arthur district and as the vessel lay within about five miles off shore, Mr. Hogstad expressed the belief that the seas were not heavy enough to pound her to pieces.

Score of Ships in Danger.

The storm on Lake Superior endangers more than a score of ships up and down bound. A big fleet of coal carriers, hurrying fuel to obviate a threatened famine in the fuel situation in the northwest, has left the Soo up-bound within the last 24 hours, and must have met the storm in the vicinity of Keweenaw point, long known as the graveyard of the lakes.

Duluth, Minn., Dec. 9.—Released at 7:15 p. m., the steamer Easton of the Booth Line escaped from the clutches of the Iroquois reef, two hours out of Port Arthur, and proceeded under her own steam to that port. All on board are safe.

She is expected to arrive in Duluth this afternoon. Since 5:30 Thursday morning, the boat had been fast on the rocks.

Captain Hawkinson's examination of his vessel brought to light no serious injuries, and by a wireless message he reported the boat's release and safety.

NEIGHBORHOOD SCARES.

Two Shots Fired Through the Panels of Door—Another Through Window.

Minneapolis. — A man, said to be Austin Hall, a janitor, threw an entire neighborhood into a panic. He fired three shots from a revolver, two through the panels of a door and another through a front window of a second house. A police search for Hall was unsuccessful.

Hall roomed with Mr. and Mrs. A. Croll, 525 Tenth avenue south. It is said that he had not been home for some time when he returned and demanded to see Mrs. Croll. Mr. Croll answered the door and ordered Hall to leave. Croll asserts that Hall thereupon pulled out a revolver and flourished it, as he demanded admittance.

Croll slammed the door shut and Mrs. Croll joined him in the hall. Hall then fired two shots through the panels of the door and one through the window, but hit no one. Mrs. Croll fainted and was hysterical.

Two young women, Miss Mary Brown and Miss Anna Anderson, were in the room at the time, but the bullet crashed past them into the wall. Before the police could reach the scene Hall had disappeared.

Adopts Commission Plan.

Duluth.—This city by the overwhelming majority of 5,524 to 3,386, the voters of Duluth decided to do away with the cumbersome ward system of municipal government and place the administration of the city's affairs in the hands of five commissioners, by adopting the new charter and commission form of government.

Child Is Scalded to Death.

Hastings.—The 2-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Claudius Irrthum of New Trier met death by falling into a kettle of hot water.

Winona Calls South Dakotan.

Winona. — St. Paul's Episcopal church of this city has just extended a call to Rev. George S. Keller of Huron, S. D. The call has the approval of Bishop Edsall. The pastorate here was left vacant through the death of Rev. Edward Borncamp while abroad last August. The new rector, if he accepts, it is understood, will not come to Winona until after the first of the year. He is said to be very popular with his congregation at Huron, where he has been serving for some time.

PREPARE TO OPEN PARCEL POST

$300,000 DISTRIBUTED TO POSTOFFICES FOR SUPPLIES.

Postmasters Ordered to Employ as Many New Men as May Be Necessary.

Washington, Dec. 9. — Postmaster General Hitchcock has apportioned among 1,600 postoffices, having city delivery, $300,000 of the parcels post appropriation to be used for equipment for the delivery of a parcels post business.

In addition to this emergency allowances, the postmaster general has authorized postmasters to employ as many temporary and auxiliary clerks and carriers as may be necessary to handle the increased volume of business.

After the parcels post system has been in operation 15 days from Jan. 1, the postmasters are directed to submit reports showing the volume of the parcels business, the additional cost and an outline of the plans for handling the new business. Through these reports Mr. Hitchcock expects to obtain a close estimate of the cost of the parcels post, so that he may inform congress what appropriations will be necessary for the operation of the new system.

For establishment of the parcels post system, the postmaster general already has authorized the expenditure of $180,000 for supplies and equipment. More than 30,000 scales have been bought at a cost of $72,000, the guide and regulations will cost $43,000; 25,000 special mail sacks, $23,000; 10,000,000 tags, $16,000; 130,000 special zone maps, $13,000; 110,000 tape lines, $1,000 and 195,000 rubber stamps and small miscellaneous necessities, $11,000.

BUSY WEEK IN CONGRESS

Numerous Investigations and Much General Legislation Must Be Considered.

Washington, Dec. 9.—Resumption of the "money trust" investigation and a hearing on the O'Shaughnessy resolution for a congressional investigation of Grand Trunk and New York, New Haven & Hartford railroad operations in New England, promise to divide congressional attention this week, with the Archbold impeachment trial and the consideration of general legislation in the two houses.

Before the end of the week, it is expected two other inquiries will be under way—the campaign expenditures investigation by the Clapp committee, and the "shipping trust" inquiry by the house committee on merchant marine.

Anti-Dry Man Enters Race.

Linton, N. D., Dec. 9.—D. R. Streeter, of this city, is a candidate for the speakership of the house of representatives of North Dakota. He makes the seventh candidate to enter the race. Mr. Streeter has the distinction of being the oldest member of the house in point of service. He was elected this fall for his fifth consecutive term. He has commanded attention because of his opposition to the prohibition law of the state.

Passenger Train Held Up.

Vancouver, B. C., Dec. 9.—The local police are searching for a masked robber, who went through a sleeping car on the Canadian Pacific railway's east bound Imperial Limited as it left Vancouver Saturday night and held up the conductor and all the passengers.

Chicago Grain.

Chicago, Dec. 9.—Fine weather for the Argentine harvest had a tendency today to ease wheat. There were also predictions that the United States government report Monday would favor the bear side. Warmer temperatures northwest counter, too, against the bulls. Opening prices varied from ⅛ lower to a shade advance. May, which opened at 80⅝c to 90⅞c, unchanged to ⅛c, off, sagged to 80½c.

Big yields in Germany added to bearish sentiment. The close was easy, with May ⅛c net lower at 90⅝c.

Country selling weakened corn. May started the same last night to 1-16c lower at 48½@48c to 48⅝c, and fell to 48¼@48⅝c.

Some week-end buying at the decline steadied prices. The close for May was ⅛@⅝c net lower at 48¼ 48⅜c.

Oats held relatively steady, owing to the fact that sales were only of a scattered sort. May opened unchanged to ⅛c higher at 33@33⅛c and reacted to 32⅞c.

$250,000 Fire in Winnipeg.

Winnipeg, Man., Can., Dec. 9.—Fire which started in Potters' wholesale furniture warehouse and completely gutted that building threatened the wholesale houses of Bromlay and Hague, tent and awning manufacturers; MacKenzie Bros. hardware specialties and the Simpson Produce company, all situated in the wholesale district on Princess street. The fire had a big start before the call was sent in and resulted in a property loss of a quarter of a million.

POINTED WAY TO SALVATION

Preacher's Advice Was All Right but His Friend Also Had Something Wise to Say.

Senator Samuel A. Ettelson, speaking recently at a banquet, told the following:

"A colored preacher stood up on a Sunday and said: 'My text this morning, brothers and sisters, am "What Shall I Do to Be Saved?" To me there seems only one way to be saved, and that am to quit this'ere extravagant living. Back to the simple life, say I. There am going to be no chance for you to be saved so long as you keep up this high living. If there is anything that is going to kill our race it is these'ere luxuries. Better go hungry and cold like the wolf. Go out and face the rains and fight the storms. Go wade with the crane. You will grow rugged and you will grow tough, but you'll walk like a man. Yes, sir, that am de way to salvation, that am de way to get saved.'

"Just then a tall colored man, rising from his pew in the rear of the church, interrupted the preacher, shouting: 'This am no way to be saved. You just jump right through that back window and run just as fast as your legs will carry you, for the county sheriff am here with a warrant for your arrest for stealing them chickens from Massa Martle's coop last Friday night.'"—Chicago Tribune.

RASH ON FACE FOR 2 YEARS

Sioux Falls, S. D.—"My trouble of skin disease started merely as a rash on my face and neck, but it grew and kept getting worse until large scabs would form, fester and break. This was just on the one side of my face, but it soon scattered to the other side. I suffered a great deal, especially at night, on account of the itching and burning. I would scratch it and of course that irritated it very much. This rash was on my face for about two years, sometimes breaking out lots worse and forming larger sores. It kept me from sleeping day or night for a couple of months. My face looked disgraceful and I was almost ashamed to be seen by my friends.

"A friend asked me to try Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment. I would bathe my face with hot water and a lot of Cuticura Soap, then I would put on the Cuticura Ointment. In less than two days' time, the soreness and inflammation had almost entirely disappeared, and in four weeks' time you could not see any of the rash. Now my face is without a spot of any kind. I also use them for my scalp and hair. They cured me completely." (Signed) Miss Pansy Hutchins, Feb. 6, 1912.

Cuticura Soap and Ointment sold throughout the world. Sample of each free, with 32-p. Skin Book. Address post-card "Cuticura, Dept. L, Boston." Adv.

"Well," said the proud father as the doctor entered the room, "what is it—a boy or a girl?"

"I'll give you two guesses, and even then you won't guess right," said the doctor.

"Tush! nonsense!" said the proud father. "Boy?"

"Nope," said the doctor.

"Ah—girl, then?" said the proud father.

"Nope," said the doctor.

"Ah—I know," said the proud father, sadly.—Harper's Weekly.

PRESIDENT TAFT SUBMITS SECOND OF HIS MESSAGES

It Deals With Fiscal, Military, Insular and Judicial Affairs of Nation.

MONEY CONDITIONS ARE GOOD

Plans for Reorganization of the Army Explained.

FILIPINO BILL CONDEMNED

Chief Executive Declares the Islanders Are Far From Ready for Self-Government—Regulation of Water Power Site Projects Urged—Promoting of Colonel Goethals Recommended.

Washington, Dec. 6.—Congress today received from President Taft the second of his messages to the short session. It deals with fiscal, military, insular and judicial affairs and in part is as follows:

The condition of the country with reference to business could hardly be better. While the four years of the administration now drawing to a close have not developed great speculative expansion or a wide field of new investment, the recovery and progress made from the depressing conditions following the panic of 1907 have been steady and the improvement has been clear and easily traced in the statistics. The business of the country is now on a solid basis. Credits are not unduly extended, and every phase of the situation seems in a state of preparedness for a period of unexampled prosperity. Manufacturing concerns are running at their full capacity and the demand for labor was never so constant and growing. The foreign trade of the country for this year will exceed $4,000,000,000, while the balance in our favor—that of the excess of exports over imports—will exceed $500,000,000. More than half our exports are manufactures or partly manufactured material, while our exports of farm products do not show the same increase of domestic consumption. It is a year of bumper crops; the total money value of farm products will exceed $9,500,000,000. It is a year when the bushel or unit price of agricultural products has gradually fallen, and yet the total value of the entire crop is greater by over $1,000,000,000 than we have known in our history.

Condition of the Treasury.

The condition of the treasury is very satisfactory. The total interest-bearing debt is $963,777,770, of which $134,631,980 constitute the Panama canal loan. The non-interest-bearing debt is $378,201,284.90, including $346,671,016 of greenbacks. We have in the treasury $150,000,000 in gold coin as a reserve against the outstanding greenbacks; and in addition we have a cash balance in the treasury as a general fund of $167,152,478.99, or an increase of $26,975,552 over the general fund last year.

Receipts and Expenditures.

For three years the expenditures of the government have decreased under the influence of an effort to economize. This year presents an apparent exception. The estimate by the secretary of the treasury of the ordinary receipts, exclusive of postal revenues, for the year ending June 30, 1914, indicates that they will amount to $710,000,000. The sum of the estimates of the expenditures for that same year, exclusive of Panama canal disbursements and postal disbursements payable from postal revenues, is $732,000,000, indicating a deficit of $22,000,000. For the year ending June 30, 1913, similarly estimated receipts were $667,000,000, while the total corresponding estimate of expenditures for that year, submitted through the secretary of the treasury to congress, amounted to $656,000,000. This shows an increase of $76,000,000 in the estimates for 1914 over the total estimates of 1913. This is due to an increase of $25,000,000 in the estimate for rivers and harbors for the next year on projects and surveys authorized by congress; to an increase under the new pension bill of $32,500,000; and to an increase in the estimates for expenses of the navy department of $24,600,000. The estimate for the navy department for the year 1913 included two battleships. Congress made provision for only one battleship, and therefore the navy department has deemed it necessary and proper to make an estimate which includes the first year's expenditure for three battleships in addition to the amount required for work on the uncompleted ships now under construction. In addition to the natural increase in the expenditures for the uncompleted ships, and the additional battleship estimated for, the other increases are due to the pay required for 4,000 or more additional enlisted men in the navy; and to this must be added the additional cost of construction imposed by the change in the eight-hour law which makes it applicable to ships built in private shipyards.

With the exceptions of these three items, the estimates show a reduction this year below the total estimates for 1913 of more than $5,000,000.

The estimates for Panama canal construction for 1914 are $17,000,000 less than for 1913.

The president then explained at some length the national reserve association system recommended by the monetary commission and urged congress to examine the plan impartially from all standpoints and then to adopt some plan which will secure the benefits desired.

Concerning the tariff he had little to say in view of the fact that a new congress has been elected on a platform of tariff for revenue only.

Army Reorganization.

Our small army now consists of 83,809 men, excluding the 5,000 Philippine scouts. Leaving out of consideration the coast artillery force, whose position is fixed in our various seacoast defenses, and the present garrisons of our various insular possessions, we have today within the continental United States a mobile army of only about 35,000 men. This little force must be still further drawn upon to supply the new garrisons for the great naval base which is being established at Pearl Harbor, in the Hawaiian islands, and to protect the locks now rapidly approaching completion at Panama. The forces remaining in the United States are now scattered in nearly fifty posts, situated for a variety of historical reasons in twenty-four states. These posts contain only fractions of regiments, averaging less than 700 men each. In time of peace it has been our historical policy to administer these units separately by a geographical organization. In other words, our army in time of peace has never been a united organization but merely scattered groups of companies, battalions and regiments, and the first task in time of war has been to create out of these scattered units an army fit for effective teamwork and co-operation.

To the task of meeting these patent defects, the war department has been addressing itself during the past year. A comprehensive plan of reorganization was prepared by the war college division of the general staff. This plan was thoroughly discussed last summer at a series of open conferences held by the secretary of war and attended by representatives from all branches of the army and from congress. In printed form it has been distributed to members of congress and throughout the army and the national guard, and widely through institutions of learning and elsewhere in the United States. In it, for the first time, we have a tentative chart for future progress.

Under the influence of this study definite and effective steps have been taken toward army reorganization so far as such reorganization lies within the executive power. Hitherto there has been no difference of policy in the treatment of the organization of our foreign garrisons from those of troops within the United States. The difference of situation is vital, and the foreign garrison should be prepared to defend itself at an instant's notice against a foe who may command the sea. Unlike the troops in the United States, it can not count upon reinforcements or recruitment. It is an outpost, upon which will fall the brunt of the first attack in case of war. The historical policy of the United States of carrying its regiments during time of peace at half strength has no application to our foreign garrisons. During the past year this defect has been remedied as to the Philippines garrison. The former garrison of 12 reduced regiments has been replaced by a garrison of six regiments at full strength, giving fully the same number of riflemen at an estimated economy in cost of maintenance of over $1,000,000 per year. This garrison is to be permanent. Its regimental units, instead of being transferred periodically back and forth from the United States, will remain in the islands. The officers and men composing these units will, however, serve a regular tropical detail as usual, thus involving no greater hardship upon the personnel and greatly increasing the effectiveness of the garrison. A similar policy is proposed for the Hawaiian and Panama garrisons as fast as the barracks for them are completed. I strongly urge upon congress that the necessary appropriations for this purpose should be promptly made. It is, in my opinion, of first importance that these national outposts, upon which a successful home defense will, primarily, depend, should be finished and placed in effective condition at the earliest possible day.

The Home Army.

Simultaneously with the foregoing steps the war department has been proceeding with the reorganization of the army at home. The formerly disassociated units are being united into a tactical organization of three divisions, each consisting of two or three brigades of infantry and, so far as practicable, a proper proportion of divisional cavalry and artillery. Of course the extent to which this reform can be carried by the executive is practically limited to a paper organization. The scattered units can be brought under a proper organization, but they will remain physically scattered until congress supplies the necessary funds for grouping them in more concentrated posts. Until that is done the present difficulty of drilling our scattered groups together, and thus training them for the proper team play, can not be removed.

Regular Army Reserve.

One of the most important reforms accomplished during the past year has been the legislation enacted in the army appropriation bill of last summer, providing for a regular army reserve. Hitherto our national policy has assumed that at the outbreak of war our regiments would be immediately raised to full strength. But our laws have provided no means by which this could be accomplished, or by which the losses of the regiments when once sent to the front could be repaired. In this respect we have neglected the lessons learned by other nations. The new law provides that the soldier, after serving four years with colors, shall pass into a reserve for three years. At his option he may go into the reserve at the end of three years, remaining there for four years. While in the reserve he can be called to active duty only in case of war or other national emergency, and when so called and only in such case will receive a stated amount of pay for all of the period in which he has been a member of the reserve. The legislation is imperfect, in my opinion, in certain particulars, but it is a most important step in the right direction, and I earnestly hope that it will be carefully studied and perfected by congress.

The National Guard.

Under existing law the national guard constitutes, after the regular army, the first line of national defense. Its organization, discipline, training, and equipment, under recent legislation, have been assimilated, as far as possible, to those of the regular army, and its practical efficiency, under the effect of this training, has very greatly increased. Our citizen soldiers under present conditions have reached a stage of development beyond which they cannot reasonably be asked to go without further direct assistance in the form of pay from the federal government. On the other hand, such pay from the national treasury would not be justified unless it produced a proper equivalent in additional efficiency on the part of the national guard. The organized militia today cannot be ordered outside of the limits of the United States, and thus cannot lawfully be used for general military purposes. The officers and men are ambitious and eager to make themselves thus available and to become an efficient national reserve of citizen soldiery. They are the only force of trained men, other than the regular army, upon which we can rely. The so-called militia pay bill, in the form agreed on between the authorities of the war department and the representatives of the national guard, in my opinion adequately meets these conditions and offers a proper return for the pay which it is proposed to give to the national guard. I believe that its enactment into law would be a very long step toward providing this nation with a first line of citizen soldiery, upon which its main reliance must depend in case of any national emergency. Plans for the organization of the national guard into tactical divisions, on the same lines as those adopted for the regular army, are being formulated by the war college division of the general staff.

National Volunteers.

The national guard consists of only about 110,000 men. In any serious war in the past it has always been necessary, and in such a war in the future it doubtless will be necessary, for the nation to depend, in addition to the regular army and the national guard, upon a large force of volunteers. There is at present no adequate provision of law for the raising of such a force. There is now pending in congress, however, a bill which makes such provision, and which I believe is admirably adapted to meet the exigencies which would be presented in case of war. The passage of the bill would not entail a dollar's expense upon the government at this time or in the future until war comes. But if war comes the methods therein directed are in accordance with the best military judgment as to what they ought to be, and the act would prevent the necessity for a discussion of any legislation and the delays incident to its consideration and adoption. I earnestly urge its passage.

Porto Rico, Mr. Taft says, continues to show notable progress and he urges the senate to pass the bill granting the Porto Ricans American citizenship.

Philippines.

A bill is pending in congress, continues the message, which revolutionizes the carefully worked out scheme of government under which the Philippine islands are now governed and which proposes to render them virtually autonomous at once and absolutely independent in eight years. Such a proposal can only be founded on the assumption that we have now discharged our trusteeship to the Filipino people and our responsibility for them to the world, and that they are now prepared for self-government as well as national sovereignty. A thorough and unbiased knowledge of the facts clearly shows that these assumptions are absolutely without justification. As to this, I believe that there is no substantial difference of opinion among any of those who have had the responsibility of facing Philippine problems in the administration of the islands, and I believe that no one to whom the future of this people is a responsible concern can countenance a policy fraught with the direst consequences to those on whose behalf it is ostensibly urged.

In the Philippine islands we have embarked upon an experiment unprecedented in dealing with dependent peoples. We are developing there conditions exclusively for their own welfare. We found an archipelago containing 24 tribes and races, speaking a great variety of languages, and with a population over 80 per cent. of which could neither read nor write. Through the unifying forces of a common education, of commercial and economic development, and of gradual participation in local self-government we are endeavoring to evolve a homogeneous people fit to determine, when the time arrives, their own destiny. We are seeking to arouse a national spirit and not, as under the elder colonial theory, to suppress such a spirit. The character of the work we have been doing is keenly recognized in the Orient, and our success thus far followed with not a little envy by those who, initiating the same policy, find themselves hampered by conditions grown up in earlier days and under different theories of administration. But our work is far from done. Our duty to the Filipinos is far from discharged. Over half a million Filipino students are now in the Philippine schools helping to mold the men of the future into a homogeneous people, but there still remain more than a million Filipino children of school age yet to be reached. Freed from American control the integrating forces of a common education and a common language will cease and the educational system now well started will slip back into inefficiency and disorder.

An enormous increase in the commercial development of the islands has been made since they were virtually granted full access to our markets three years ago, with every prospect of increasing development and diversified industries. Freed from American control such development is bound to decline. Every observer speaks of the great progress in public works for the benefit of the Filipinos, of harbor improvements, of road and railways, of irrigation and artesian wells, public buildings, and better means of communication. But large parts of the islands are still unreached, still even unexplored, roads and railways are needed in many parts, irrigation systems are still to be installed and wells to be driven. Whole villages and towns are still without means of communication other than almost impassible roads and trails. Even the great progress in sanitation which has successfully suppressed smallpox, the bubonic plague, and Asiatic cholera, has found the cause of and a cure for beriberi, has segregated the lepers, has helped to make Manila the most healthful city in the Orient, and to free life throughout the whole archipelago from its former dread diseases, is nevertheless incomplete in many essentials of permanence in sanitary policy. Even more remains to be accomplished. If freed from American control sanitary progress is bound to be arrested and all that has been achieved likely to be lost.

If the task we have undertaken is higher than that assumed by other nations, its accomplishment must demand even more patience. We must not forget that we found the Filipinos wholly untrained in government. Up to our advent all other experience sought to repress rather than encourage political power. It takes long time and much experience to ingrain political habits of steadiness and efficiency. Popular self-government ultimately must rest upon common habits of thought and upon a reasonably developed public opinion. No such foundations for self-government, let alone independence, are now present in the Philippine islands. Disregarding even their racial heterogeneity and the lack of ability to think as a nation, it is sufficient to point out that under liberal franchise privileges only about 3 per cent. of the Filipinos vote and only 5 per cent. of the people are said to read the public press. To confer independence upon the Filipinos now is, therefore, to subject the great mass of their people to the dominance of an oligarchical and, probably, exploiting minority. Such a course will be as cruel to those people as it would be shameful to us.

Our true course is to pursue steadily and courageously the path we have thus far followed; to guide the Filipinos into self-sustaining pursuits; to continue the cultivation of sound political habits through education and political practice; to encourage the diversification of industries, and to realize the advantages of their industrial education by conservatively approved co-operative methods, at once checking the danger of concentrated wealth and building up a sturdy, independent citizenship.

Regulation of Water Power.

There are pending before congress a large number of bills proposing to grant privileges of erecting dams for the purpose of creating water power in our navigable rivers. The pendency of these bills has brought out an important defect in the existing general dam act. That act does not, in my opinion, grant sufficient power to the federal government in dealing with the construction of such dams to exact protective conditions in the interest of navigation. It does not permit the federal government, as a condition of its permit, to require that a part of the value thus created shall be applied to the further general improvement and protection of the stream. I believe this to be one of the most important matters of internal improvement now confronting the government. Most of the navigable rivers of this country are comparatively long and shallow. In order that they may be made fully useful for navigation there has come into vogue a method of improvement known as canalization, or the slack-water method, which consists in building a series of dams and locks, each of which will create a long pool of deep navigable water. At each of these dams there is usually created a long pool of deep navigable water. At each of these dams there is usually created also water power of commercial value. If the water power thus created can be made available for the further improvement of navigation in the stream, it is manifest that the improvement will be much more quickly effected on the one hand, and, on the other, that the burden on the general taxpayers of the country will be very much reduced. Private interests seeking permits to build water-power dams in navigable streams usually urge that they thus improve navigation, and that if they do not impair navigation they should be allowed to take for themselves the entire profits of the water-power development. Whatever they may do by way of relieving the government of the expense of improving navigation should be given due consideration, but it must be apparent that there may be a profit beyond a reasonably liberal return upon the private investment which is a potential asset of the government in carrying out a comprehensive policy of waterway development. It is no objection to the retention and use of such an asset by the government that a comprehensive waterway policy will include the protection and development of the other public uses of water, which cannot and should not be ignored in making and executing plans for the protection and development of navigation. It is also equally clear that inasmuch as the water power thus created is or may be an incident of a general scheme of waterway improvement within the constitutional jurisdiction of the federal government, the regulation of such water power lies also within that jurisdiction. In my opinion constructive statesmanship requires that legislation should be enacted which will permit the development of navigation in these great rivers to go hand in hand with the utilization of this by-product of water power, created in the course of the same improvement, and that the general dam act should be so amended as to make this possible. I deem it highly important that the nation should adopt a consistent and harmonious treatment of these water-power projects, which will preserve for this purpose their value to the government, whose right it is to grant the permit. Any other policy is equivalent to throwing away a most valuable national asset.

The Panama Canal.

During the past year the work of construction upon the canal has progressed most satisfactorily. About 87 per cent of the excavation work has been completed, and more than 93 per cent of the concrete for all the locks is in place. In view of the great interest which has been manifested as to some slides in the Culebra Cut, I am glad to say that the report of Col. Goethals should allay any apprehension on this point. It is gratifying to note that none of the slides which occurred during this year would have interfered with the passage of the ships had the canal, in fact, been in operation, and when the slope pressures will have been finally adjusted and the growth of vegetation will minimize erosion in the banks of the cut, the slide problem will be practically solved and an ample stability assured for the Culebra Cut.

Although the official date of the opening has been set for January 1, 1915, the canal will, in fact, from present indications, be opened for shipping during the latter half of 1913. No fixed date can as yet be set, but shipping interests will be advised as soon as assurances can be given that vessels can pass through without unnecessary delay.

Recognizing the administrative problem in the management of the canal, congress in the act of August 24, 1912, has made admirable provisions for executive responsibility in the control of the canal and the government of the Canal Zone. The problem of most efficient organization is receiving careful consideration, so that a scheme of organization and control best adapted to the conditions of the canal may be formulated and put in operation as expeditiously as possible. Acting under the authority conferred on me by congress, I have, by executive proclamation, promulgated the following schedule of tolls for ships passing through the canal, based upon the thorough report of Emory R. Johnson, special commissioner on traffic and tolls:

1. On merchant vessels carrying passengers or cargo, $1.20 per net vessel ton—each 100 cubic feet—of actual capacity.
2. On vessels in ballast without passengers or cargo, 40 per cent less than the rate of tolls for vessels with passengers or cargo.
3. Upon naval vessels, other than transports, colliers, hospital ships, and supply ships, 50 cents per displacement ton.
4. Upon army and navy transports, colliers, hospital ships, and supply ships, $1.20 per net ton, the vessels to be measured by the same rules as are employed in determining the net tonnage of merchant vessels.

Rules for the determination of the tonnage upon which toll charges are based are now in course of preparation and will be promulgated in due season.

Panama Canal Treaty.

The proclamation which I have issued in respect to the Panama Canal tolls is in accord with the Panama Canal act passed by this congress August 24, 1912. We have been advised that the British government has prepared a protest against the act and its enforcement in so far as it relieves from the payment of tolls American ships engaged in the American coastwise trade on the ground that it violates British rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty concerning the Panama Canal. When the protest is presented, it will be promptly considered and an effort made to reach a satisfactory adjustment of any differences there may be between the two governments.

Promotion for Col. Goethals.

As the completion of the canal grows nearer, and as the wonderful executive work of Col. Goethals becomes more conspicuous in the eyes of the country and of the world, it seems to me wise and proper to make provision by law for such reward to him as may be commensurate with the service that he has rendered to his country. I suggest that this reward take the form of an appointment of Col. Goethals as a major general in the army of the United States, and that the law authorizing such appointment be accompanied with a provision permitting his designation as chief of engineers upon the retirement of the present incumbent of that office.

Navy Department.

The navy of the United States is in a greater state of efficiency and is more powerful than it has been before, but in the emulation which exists between different countries in respect to the increase of naval and military armaments this condition is not of a permanent one. In view of the many improvements and increases by foreign governments the slightest halt on our part in respect to new construction throws us back and reduces us from a naval power of the first rank and places us among the nations of the second rank.

A year ago congress refused to appropriate for more than one battleship. In this I think a great mistake of policy was made, and I urgently recommend that this congress make up for the mistake of the last session by appropriations authorizing the construction of three battleships, in addition to destroyers, fuel ships, and the other auxiliary vessels as shown in the building program of the general board. We are confronted by a condition in respect to the navies of the world which requires us, if we would maintain our navy as an insurance of peace, to augment our naval force by at least two battleships a year and by battle cruisers, gunboats, torpedo destroyers, and submarine boats in a proper proportion. We have no desire for war. We go as far as any nation in the world to avoid war, but we are a world power. Our population, our wealth, our definite policies, our responsibilities in the Pacific and the Atlantic, our defense of the Panama canal, together with our enormous world trade and our missionary outposts on the frontiers of civilization, require us to recognize our position as one of the foremost in the family of nations, and to clothe ourselves with sufficient naval power to give force to our reasonable demands, and to give weight to our influence in those directions of progress that a powerful Christian nation should advocate.

Department of Justice.

This department has been very active in the enforcement of the law. It has been better organized and with a larger force than ever before in the history of the government. The prosecutions which have been successfully concluded and which are now pending testify to the effectiveness of the department work.

The prosecution of trusts under the Sherman anti-trust law has gone on without restraint or diminution, and decrees similar to those entered in the Standard Oil and the Tobacco cases have been entered in other suits, like the suits against the powder trust and the bath tub trust. I am very strongly convinced that a steady, consistent course in his regard, with a continuing of Supreme court decisions upon new phases of the trust question not already finally decided, is going to offer a solution of this much-discussed and troublesome issue in a quiet, calm and judicial way, without any radical legislation changing the governmental policy in regard to combinations now denounced by the Sherman anti-trust law. I have already recommended as an aid in this matter legislation which would declare unlawful certain well-known phases of unfair competition in interstate trade, and I have also advocated voluntary national incorporation for the larger industrial enterprises, with provision for a closer supervision by the bureau of corporations, or a board appointed for the purpose, so as to make certain compliance with the anti-trust law on the one hand and to give greater security to the stockholders against possible prosecutions on the other. I believe, however, that the orderly course of litigation in the courts and the regular prosecution of trusts charged with the violation of the anti-trust law is producing among business men a clearer and clearer perception of the line of distinction between business that is to be encouraged and business that is to be condemned, and that in this quiet way the question of trusts can be settled and competition retained as an economic force to secure reasonableness in prices and freedom and independence in trade.

Workman's Compensation Act.

The workman's compensation act reported by the special commission appointed by congress and the executive, which passed the senate and is now pending in the house, the passage of which I have in previous messages urged upon congress, I venture again to call to its attention. The opposition to it which developed in the senate, but which was overcome by a majority in that body, seemed to me to grow out rather of a misapprehension of its effect than of opposition to its principle. I say again that I think no act can have a better effect directly upon the relations between the employer and employe than this act applying to railroads and common carriers and an interstate character, and I am sure that the passage of the act would greatly relieve the courts of the heaviest burden of litigation that they have, and would enable them to dispatch other business with a speed never before attained in courts of justice in this country.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1906, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

WHY FOLLOW THE BIRDS?

The exodus for the South for the cold months will not be noticeable this year. No one would have the nerve to ask for more perfect weather than has prevailed in the Red River valley. There has not been a storm, only a couple of snow flurries that went as rapidly as they came. Automobiling is still a popular pastime and the roads are ideal.

And every day you hear some one telling a story which starts, "This fall reminds me of the fall of——," and about a dozen or fifteen years are enumerated. Such winter weather is not unusual in this section, and is growing more and more frequent, although the winter of '78 and '79 was remarkably open.

This climate is moderating year by year, however, the same change taking place as was noticed in Illinois and Ohio—a moderation which seems to follow civilization and development.

There is no comparison between the rigors of the winters here now and 30 years ago, on an average. Last winter was remarkably severe, the most severe experienced for a great many years, and in all probability more severe than will be experienced in the next twenty years.

This continued moderation of winters is a big asset to the Northwest. It will attract many who for years had a false notion of the severity of Red River valley winters.

Not many years ago "blizzard" in the winter time could be seen on the front page of most any northwestern paper. Now the word is scarcely ever seen, and a great many people who have been here only five or ten years have never seen a real blizzard—because we don't have them any more. True it is, no one could wish for a grander climate than the sample we have had thus far, and this is not much better than the average for the past ten years. —Crookston Times.

We cannot see what is the use of putting the people to the expense of holding a session of the legislature, when we have his Nibs Governor Eberhart to make laws.

The Eleven Towns says we call him a political mugwamp because he supported Leimers. Not at all Mr. Lattimore, but if you want us to prove your "mugwampery" we can easily do so by publishing a few extracts from the back files of your paper. We never said a word against Leimers as a man or a candidate, but we supported Mr. Mandt because he was the regular nominee of the party we were supporting, and we was not on the republican County committee either.

Drives Off A Terror.

The chief executioner of death in the winter and spring months is pneumonia. Its advance agents are colds and grip. In any attack by one of these maladies no time should be lost in taking the best medicine obtainable to drive it off. Countless thousands have found this to be Dr. King's New Discovery. "My husband believes it has kept him from having pneumonia three or four times," writes Mrs. George W. Place, Rawsonville, Vt., "and for coughs, colds and croup we have never found its equal." Guaranteed for all bronchial affections. Price 50 cts. and $1.00. Trial bottle free at All Druggists.

Successful.

"Are you making anything this season, John?"
"Yes."
"What?"
"A big bluff."

Could Shout For Joy.

"I want to thank you from the bottom of my heart," writes [illegible] B Rader, of Lewisburg, W. Va., "for the wonderful double benefit I got from Electric Bitters, in curing me of both a severe case of stomach trouble and of rheumatism, from which I had been an almost helpless sufferer for ten years. It suited my case as though made just for me. For dyspepsia, indigestion, jaundice, and to rid the system of kidney poisons that cause rheumatism, Electric Bitters have no equal. Try them. Every bottle is guaranteed to satisfy. Only 50 cents at All Druggists.

Wagers in an Old Betting Book.

Many events of human life figure in the old betting book of Brooks'. The frequency of bets on births is illustrated by Lord Mountford's answer when he was asked whether his daughter was going to present him with a grandchild: "Upon my word, I do not know. I have no bet upon it." Eight bets running in Sheridan's name range from the question whether the French had occupied Amsterdam to the question whether the shortest way from one house to another was by Sackville street or Bond street. There are fifty guineas on the double event that Lord Ilchester gives his first vote in opposition and hits eight out of his first ten pheasants, and "Lord Clermont has given Mr. Crawford ten guineas upon the condition of receiving £500 from him whenever Mr. Charles Fox shall be worth £100,000 clear of debts."—London Chronicle.

A PERSISTENT ABBE.

Romance of Mountain Road Building in the Pyrenees.

C. L. Freeston in "The Passes of the Pyrenees" quotes the story of Felix Armand, cure of St. Martin-Lys, who pierced a road through the magnificent Gorge de Pierre-Lys in order to bring prosperity to his poverty stricken village. The cure himself marked out the route, "hanging like a spider from the end of a rope over the awful precipices of the Pierre-Lys. After five years' incessant toil the workmen reached the huge mass of rock which blocks the gorge near Belvianes." Still he bravely incited his parishioners to persevere until in 1781 the tunnel was pierced which still bears the name of "Le Trou du Cure." The revolution stopped the work, but after the reign of terror the cure set to work anew.

"A pity the man should be a priest," said Napoleon when he heard of Armand's heroic efforts. "I would have made him a general in my army."

The cure's personal bravery was great. Once when a mine was about to explode a muleteer was seen riding round a corner. The priest instantly sprang out and extinguished a slow match just at its last inch. Armand was made an abbe, but he declined to leave his flock and was buried at St. Martin-Lys with the cross of the Legion of Honor on his breast.

LEGENDS ABOUT DEW.

Curious Beliefs as to Its Origin and Varied Powers.

In many places dew is looked upon as tears of the angels and of the souls in purgatory shed on account of the sins of human beings upon earth, and dew is collected to be used to cure certain diseases, especially those of the eyes, freckles, baldness, cramps, open wounds and cuts, rheumatism, skin diseases, burns, etc.

The virtues of dew as a beauty wash are also well known, remarks the Journal of Religious Psychology. One legend tells how by licking the dew off the plants on a certain morning when all the birds drink it one can learn their language.

Another folk belief is that naked or with only their shirts on the witches at the time of the new moon collect the dew from the grass with bark sleeves. By this means they deprive of their milk the cows that have been pastured on the grass, and as soon as their sleeves are full of dew they know that their pots at home are full of milk.

The Polish people of Wongrowitz call the dew on which the birds are supposed to feed ptasie mleko—i. e., "birds' milk."

An Example of Daring.

During the hottest fighting in the Shipka pass the leading battalion of the Russian General Dragomiroff's division recoiled before a hailstorm of Turkish bullets. The general was a very stout person and had the appearance of a peaceful German professor. But when he saw his men recoil he dismounted and walked slowly to and fro along a ridge swept by the enemy's bullets. He was a hundred yards in advance of the men, occupying the position they had abandoned. After staying there for awhile without being touched he shouted back to the battalion: "What are you doing, you geese? Did you think there was danger here? I don't find any!" The men responded with a roar of cheers, doubled up to him and charged so fiercely that the Turks were forced to retreat.

An Unexpected Conclusion.

A mistress was summoned in a London court for having dismissed a servant girl without due notice. The defendant pleaded that the servant was so voracious that she could not keep her in food. The judge after hearing the evidence inquired of the defendant, "Will four and sixpence a week keep her?" "Not nearly," replied the lady. "Will 6 shillings?" continued the judge. "No; that would not keep her," replied the defendant, feeling that in the judge's hands her case was gaining strength. "Now take care," said the judge, "and answer cautiously. Will 7 shillings?" "It takes 8," said the defendant. "Very well," said the judge. "Then you must pay her 8 shillings a week as board wages for one month."—London Mail.

Good Intentions.

"I do my best," said Mr. Clumsie, "to scatter sunshine and encourage a spirit of patience and cheerfulness, but somehow I always go wrong."

"What has happened?"

"I met a friend who looked a little gloomy, so I said to him: 'Cheer up! Nothing is as bad as it might be. Every cloud has a silver lining, and you only make trouble worse by thinking about it.'"

"Didn't he respond?"

"No. He simply said: 'Don't bother me. I've got the toothache.'"—Washington Star.

Heredity.

"Cute little cuss," said Slabsides, gazing at Hawkins' baby, "but why the dickens do you suppose he's trying to get his toes into his mouth all the time?"

"Takes after me," said Hawkins. "He's trying to make both ends meet." —Harper's.

Explaining It.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

The Leimers and Mandt Commissioner contest does not seem to have been settled by that special election. What seems to have mixed things up was allowing the man Larson to come in as a "sticker" Republican, which any lawyer that ever looked at a law book had ought to know would invalidate the election. If Leimers, a man of an opposite political party had not been a candidate, then Larson would have had a right to run with stickers against Mandt but under the circumstances he had no business in that fight. We would say the same if Mandt had been elected instead of Leimers. It was not an honest election, but a rotten political deal.

Bennie Narveson was transacting business at Thief River Falls Wednesday.

Thief River Falls people are building a railroad east from that city into this territory, but it is likely to turn out to be only a "hot air" line, but never mind boys we will surely have a railroad soon, for there will be a lot of Empire builders looking after the business of this country in the near future.

Going Back to Joab

By Donald Allen

Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.

For a year past it had been thoroughly understood that Joab Smith and Nancy Hillets were to become one and inseparable. Joab was farmer Hillets' hired man. Nancy was 20 and she thought Joab the best thing going. There were no rivals—no jealousies. At a certain date Joab was to get a certain sum of money from an estate, and then the merriage would take place.

Farmer Hillets and his wife were satisfied. Their consent had already been given, and they were treating Joab as if he were already one of the family.

"A leetle slow — a leetle slow — Joab," the farmer would say, "but he gits there in time."

For several years the farmer had taken in three or four summer boarders every season, but crops being good and money plenty he added to his house room and prepared to accommodate a dozen guests.

It was the first guest that arrived that played hob with the peace of the family. Farmer Hillets had a streak of vanity that had lain dormant for 44 years. When he stood in the middle of the highway and looked at his house with the new addition on—at the newly painted fence in front—at the sign of "Summer Boarding" in a conspicuous place, that latent vanity came to the surface and blossomed. His farm was a farm no longer—it was "The Lake View," although the nearest lake was 90 miles away. He was a farmer no longer—he was a landlord. He didn't break his back of the spring work, but loafed around and left Joab's back to bear most of the burden. He also cultivated an appetite for five-cent cigars and in one short month there was such a change in him that his wife asked Joab under her breath:

"Have you noticed how much different pa is lately?"

"There does seem to be a change," was the reply.

"Is he kinder losing his mind?"

"I guess he's puffed up a bit."

The first comer was an actor. Farmer Hillets had heard and read more or less of actors and he was not only curious but a good deal awed. When he learned that that actor had made a study of genealogy and human nature, he was reverential. The son of the drama could not only trace the Hillets family back a thousand years but could tell at a brief glance the character of any man he came in contact with. All this besides earning a salary of $400 per week as a leading man.

Could Tell at a Brief Glance the Character of Any Man.

Farmer Hillets didn't know whether the actor led a procession, a cow or a horse, and he didn't ask. He wasn't giving himself away.

The actor spent the first week trying to flirt with Nancy and in making Joab jealous. The second week he got down to brass tacks and informed the farmer that the Hillets were the direct descendants of King Carlo, of Denmark, and that they had bluer blood than any Knickerbocker in New York. Mr. Hillets ran in breathless haste to tell his wife.

"Well, what of it?" she asked.

"What of it? Why, we are some pumpkins, b'gosh! Any man that can trace his blood back to a king has a right to hold up his head."

"Well, don't hold it up 'till you get a crick in the neck!"

The next day the farmer was informed that Joab's character had been read, and that he was a man of low origin and would probably bring up in prison all right, but that was his natural craftiness. Beware of Joab! He was planning to get the Hillets farm into his hands and send the old folks to the poor-house. He might seem to love Nancy, but that was his plot. He would send her to her grave with a broken heart within a year.

The actor bore down hard on Joab because Nancy had refused to flirt and because he had overheard Joab answer to an inquiry as to who the guest was by saying:

"Looks like a confidence man an' had better keep an eye on him."

Farmer Hillets was greatly surprised to hear such a report about Joab. He thought it over for half a day and then went to his wife to tell her the particulars and add:

"Of course, we can't take such a man into the family."

"What do you mean by that?" was asked.

"Why, we can't let him marry Nancy."

"Moses Hillets, are you out of your head? Joab is all right and your actor is a fool. Do you suppose we could make Nancy believe such stuff even if we believed it ourselves? They will get married unless one of them dies."

Mr. Hillets retired from the contest for a day. Then he saw Nancy out in the orchard and sneaked out to tell her that Joab was unworthy of her and could never be a son-in-law of his.

"I shall marry him as soon as we are ready," was the firm reply.

"But you are my daughter, and I command you to break this affair off at once."

"We shall now get married a month sooner than we intended to!"

The father dropped it, but only for a day. Then he went down to the field where Joab was toiling and put the matter up to him. He tried to be very nice about it, for he liked the young man but he had to be firm at the same time. Joab must make his exit. A little reflection must convince him that he was no mate for the daughter of a man who had descended from King Carlo. He would probably lose his appetite for a few days, and Nancy might shed a few tears, and then it would be all over.

"You'll give me a couple of weeks to make up my mind in, won't you?" asked Joab.

"Oh, for sure. I know you'll come to see it as I do."

During the rest of the day Joab looked like a man bearing a mental burden, but after a talk with Nancy and her mother that night his face wore a smile.

"You and Joab ain't going to do no eloping to get married," said the mother, "and we are going to bring your father to his senses. That actor man seems to have turned his head."

Before the two weeks were up the "Lake View House" was full of guests, and farmer Hillets went around chuckling and rubbing his palms together. The season would be a great success. He did not forget that little affair between Nancy and Joab. To his surprise, neither of them seemed cast down, and every time he spoke to his wife about it she answered without interest.

Joab's two weeks would expire on a Wednesday. As the day drew near he was reminded of it, and he answered that he would be ready with his answer. On Tuesday evening, as the father was King Carloing around, Nancy asked him to fetch some potatoes from the granary in the barn to be prepared for breakfast. He went without a lantern, and the moment he was inside the room the door was slammed on his heels and locked. When he began a row a voice called:

"Father, you must be careful!"

"That you, Nancy?" he shouted back. "What have you locked me in for?"

"Father, there is a box in there with two skunks in it!"

"There is!"

"Joab trapped them last night."

"What for?"

"He's going to stir them up and let them loose as he leaves in the morning."

"Great Scott, but he mustn't do that!"

"But he will. Father, you have made a desperate man of him. You know what will happen if those animals are stirred up, don't you?"

"Do I? Do I? Why no one can live around here for a month!"

"Just so, father."

"It will be our ruin!"

"It will."

"Our place will be known as the 'Skunk View House!'"

"I agree with you, father—perfectly agree with you, and now, as Joab is so desperate—and as you don't want to be ruined—and as you may stir up the animals any minute—and as I'll run away to get married if you oppose, don't you think it best to—"

"Yes! Yes! Lemme out o' here and have Joab get that box a mile away as quick as he can and you can get married the first thing in the morning!"

And in the morning, when he found that the box contained only two woodchucks, he didn't go back on his word. As the descendant of a king he couldn't.

Afraid for Her Mother.

Her father had been reading the parable of the sheep and the goats. She made no comment, but that evening a sound of weeping came from her little bed. Her mother went to console her.

"Why are you crying, dear?"

"About the goats! I'm so afraid I'm a goat, and I'll never go to heaven. Oh, I'm so afraid I'm a goat!"

"No, dear, you're a sweet little lamb, and if you were to die tonight you would go straight to heaven."

With such reassuring remarks she was finally comforted.

The next night, however, she began to weep again, and again her mother asked the reason.

"I'm afraid about the goats!" she sobbed.

"Didn't mother tell you that you were a little lamb, and you mustn't worry about being a goat?"

"Yes, mamma, I know that, but I'm awful afraid you're a goat!"—Harper's Magazine.

$10.00 Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof Self-healing Tires A SAMPLE PAIR TO INTRODUCE, ONLY $4.80

The regular retail price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but to introduce we will sell you a sample pair for $4.80 (cash with order $4.55).

NO MORE TROUBLE FROM PUNCTURES

DESCRIPTION: Made in all sizes. It is lively and easy riding, very durable and lined inside with a special quality of rubber, which never becomes porous and which closes up small punctures without allowing the air to escape. We have hundreds of letters from satisfied customers stating that their tires have only been pumped up once or twice in a whole season. They weigh no more than an ordinary tire, the puncture resisting qualities being given by several layers of thin, specially prepared fabric on the tread. The regular price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but for advertising purposes we are making a special factory price to the rider of only $4.80 per pair. All orders shipped same day letter is received. We ship C. O. D. on approval. You do not pay a cent until you have examined and found them strictly as represented.

We will allow a cash discount of 5 per cent (thereby making the price $4.55 per pair) if you send FULL CASH WITH ORDER and enclose this advertisement. You run no risk in sending us an order as the tires may be returned at OUR expense if for any reason they are not satisfactory on examination. We are perfectly reliable and money sent to us is as safe as in a bank. If you order a pair of these tires, you will find that they will ride easier, run faster, wear better, last longer and look finer than any tire you have ever used or seen at any price. We know that you will be so well pleased that when you want a bicycle you will give us your order. We want you to send us a trial order at once, hence this remarkable tire offer.

Notice the thick rubber tread "A" and puncture strips "B" and "D," also rim strip "H" to prevent rim cutting. This tire will outlast any other make—SOFT, ELASTIC and EASY RIDING.

IF YOU NEED TIRES don't buy any kind at any price until you send for a pair of Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof tires on approval and trial at the special introductory price quoted above; or write for our big Tire and Sundry Catalogue which describes and quotes all makes and kinds of tires at about half the usual prices.

DO NOT WAIT but write us a postal today. DO NOT THINK OF BUYING a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone until you know the new and wonderful offers we are making. It only costs a postal to learn everything. Write it NOW.

The SPIRIT of CHRISTMAS

Columbine.

ON the left, just past the weather hen's nest, and not more than two steps from the box where they keep the cuckoo, there is the long bed where roses bloom all the year round. And they grow like this so that Columbine may always have one to stick in her hair, and that odd, mocking, soft-hearted cynic Pierrot may cull one now and again to twiddle between his teeth.

If you know the way, and the Cheshire cat will let you, you walk down the garden path, past the butterfly lime, and arrive at the neatest little cottage in Olympus.

Now this is the dwelling place of the Harlequin set—Harlequin, Columbine, Clown and Pantaloon. It is one cottage in a little colony on the lower slopes of Mount Olympus (where the high gods dwell: Jupiter and the likes), and is most important because it contains the oldest inhabitants.

The Clerk of the Weather lives a little higher up. The Four Queens and Kings live in a square of pagoda-like houses, and are waited upon by the Knaves. Pierrot and Pierrette live in romantic seclusion by a pool in a tumble-down place covered with blue roses. And away behind the fields of stars where the flocks of clouds graze, there is another village where the Seven Princesses live, and the Third Son and an Ogre, and a Talking Rabbit, and all those peculiar and beautiful people who are entangled in our minds with the memories of night nurseries, and the scent of our mothers who bent over us in wonderful toilettes, and told us to go to sleep, or they'd be late for dinner.

When it gets to be about Christmas there is a sort of aroma of excitement on the lower slopes of Olympus, and, especially in the house where Harlequin lives—a delicious sense of something exciting happening.

Columbine opens the lid of the well that looks down onto the world, and there comes up a murmur of children's voices, and you can hear the quaintest things being said about the hanging up of stockings, and about Santa Claus and the likely width of chimneys, and the running power of reindeer. And there is a tremendous rustle of colored paper, and a great run on almonds and raisins, and quite respectable citizens stand in front of shop windows gazing at dolls and dolls gaze back at them, so that the citizens go back forty years at a rush, and the rush is so great sometimes that they get tears in their eyes; for memory is quicker than motor cars, and the road it travels is often dark and broken.

So Columbine leaves the top of the well open all day and all night, and all the people in her cottage sleep with their windows open, so that the sweetly laden air comes up and gives them wonderful dreams. It does more than that. It waves the branches of the Christmas tree that grows at the bottom of the garden, near the sausage frames, and very soon candles begin to bud on its branches.

Now when the candles begin to get ripe, which happens at the same time that geese and turkeys hang in rows in shops and grow rosettes all over them, Harlequin takes an old, oaken pipe from a cupboard under the stairs, and they all sit round while he puts it to his lips and blows.

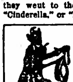
As he plays, dreams come to them of their ancient days, for Harlequin is first cousin to Mercury, and wears a black mask to hide the light of his face when he visits Columbine, who is Psyche, the Soul; the Clown is Momus, the Spirit of Laughter; and Pantaloon is Charon, who has that grim work of ferrying the souls over the Styx.

There's an odd link of memories and of things held all through the centuries, but the most charming is this: Columbine is a flower-like person, and there is a flower called Columbine, and it is so called because it is like four doves with outspread wings, and the French dove is colombe, and the dove is the symbol of the soul. So the world is never allowed to forget beautiful things, even if the burden of history is borne on the back of a flower. And the god-like glow and glitter of Mercury's limbs still shows in the glistening sequins on Harlequin's clothes, parti-colored as they have always been, to show how he covered his nakedness with rags.

All this, beautified by the essence of Time, like things put away in a cedar chest, comes back when Harlequin blows on his pipe that air the shepherds learnt in Greece from Pan.

The next night Clown will take out another kind of pipe, a long churchwarden of white clay, and fill it with tobacco, and then as the fragrant clouds roll up into the rafters, memories come of all the great people of the Harlequinades they play down in the world, all inspired by them, and they see the figure of Tarlaton, who was the first clown, and invented the very clothes they now wear, hand in hand with Grimaldi, that great clown. And they seem to see all the great Italian Harlequins, and the dainty French Columbines, and the old dandies of fifteenth-century Venice whose clothes Pantaloon wears.

Do you know that elderly gentlemen in the World smell that magic tobacco, or something like it, and they forget their paunches, or their bald heads, and they sit and dream of the time they went to their first pantomime? Was it "Cinderella," or "Beauty and the Beast"? Or was it that splendid thing "Mother Goose," or that entrancing production "The Yellow Dwarf"?



Pantaloon.

Such things are conjured up by just that one pipe of tobacco smoked in the cottage on Olympus, and on that night a gentle breeze blows up through the well, laden with the poignant, eternal memories of childhood, and the candles on the Christmas tree are all ready to be lighted. They are so ready that when Pantaloon looks out of his window before making up his face for the day he sees that the candles have burst into flame-flowers in the night.

Then Columbine takes out a pipe, and she puts some magic soap into nectar and stirs it round with the bowl of the pipe until frothy suds appear. And then she blows bubbles that float up and out of the window until they reach the Christmas tree, when they turn into great, glittering glass balls, all sorts of colors, and show pictures of the world all colored and shining.

The children in the World look up and think they see Harlequin and Columbine floating down as gently as feathers, but they don't say so because their elders would only tell them it was the clouds. But it is Harlequin and Columbine, and Pantaloon and Clown follow soon after, bringing the Christmas tree with them.

Pierrette.

Now their work begins, each to his own job and Columbine to hers. Clown to preparing the laughter that must spring up in this season, and ripple as easily as a barley field in a breeze. Harlequin to his magic, for common things must appear beautiful now, and a penny must buy the wealth of the Indies. And Pantaloon to stirring up old memories in dull people, so that uncles must remember all their nephews in remembering when they were nephews themselves, and had a peculiar hunger at Christmas.

Columbine is awfully practical. Her sentiment extends from the joy of watching the making of baby-clothes to the pleasure of remembering to put nice soap in the spare rooms. It is she who sees that children get the right presents, and when they don't it is not her fault, but the fault of some stupid person in a shop.

It is she who suggests the secret delight of keeping presents hidden at the bottom of the wardrobe; and it is she who suggests the secret delight of peering at children when they are asleep.

Merry Christmas to YOU!

There are Pagan Saints who find Arcadia everywhere. Pan pipes as much in the crowded city as on Mount Ida when the sun is high. And Columbine finds roses where the world sees thorns; and Harlequin finds magic in motor 'buses; and Pantaloon digs away for pleasant memories in the most unlikely places, and finds them bright and clean, and as good as new.

These half-gods of mine (and yours) come down at Christmas to correct the bilious attitude of the rest of the year. They come to sow those seeds that grow to flowers in the still innocent hearts. They are the influence that makes you give a man fifty cents instead of a quarter. And the being who says that the business of life weighs more than the sentiment had better hang up his stocking on Christmas Eve, and see what it feels like to find nothing but a hole in it in the morning.

Pierrot.

And when it is dark these four quaint figures flit through the country, city, town and village like conspirators, Harlequin tapping doors and windows with his magic wand. "Open, open!" he cries to the Spirit of Christmas. "Let the rich uncle reward his needy nephew, and the unforgiving father his repentant son. Mothers, forget to be jealous of your elder daughter's growing beauty. Children, forget your spite and naughtiness. Let's be old-fashioned. Let's believe in ghosts. I'll tell you ghost-stories, stories of yourselves when you were children and played Pirates on the stairs."

"Open, open, you old grousers! And let the Spirit of Fun come into this house. Romp a bit, and lose your twopenny dignity, for pompous stiffness makes the gods laugh."

Pantaloon, taking his turn, taps with his walking-stick, and says:

"Open, open, and let in the flood of memories of the good old times! Holly and mistletoe and robins, and church bells sounding over the snow. And hampers all packed to be sent away, and plenty to eat at home."

Harlequin.

And then Columbine steals up to the windows, and taps them with the rose from her hair, and she whispers:

"Open, open to me all you who have no children and no friends and no hope, and I will be the warm, nestling thing you covet for your frozen hearts, and you shall feel my soft cheek against yours till the tears come and your heart takes life again. You shall give joy to other people's children. And if you have no friends who have children, are there not a thousand, thousand children who have no friends? Go to them, and give them all you can, and you will be rewarded almost more than you can bear, for there is a link between those who suffer. Are there not some you have forgotten or neglected? This lonely man, that lonely woman whom you have left uncared for, perhaps for years. Put on your hat and your coat, and put your heart on your sleeve, so that all may know your errand."

To see her pleading before black, sombre houses where a thin light shines under a blind; to see her face pressed against the window of some big mansion where a man or a woman sits alone with hearts like stone; to see her tears as she essays to melt an aching heart is to see something so touching and beautiful that one almost wonders the doors and windows are not instantly opened to admit the spirit of love she begs for so pitifully.

"Look at yourselves, Messieurs et Mesdames Importance, and remember the funny little things you used to be when you bit at coral and bells and wore bibs, and thought everybody in the world had enough to eat; when you hated to go to bed early, and crept downstairs in your nightgowns to listen over the bannisters to the voices in the dining room; when no jam for tea was a tragedy. And when your mother's knee was the throne of justice and mercy, for you buried your head there with her hand in your hair, and forgot to be afraid of the dark."

Columbine has her own very particular work, and she calls it in her mind Secret Delights. She calls it that because she delights in making up odd names for emotions, as, for instance, when she pointed out two lovers to me one day in the spring, who were seated under a hedge, yellow-flushed with primroses; they were holding hands and looking at the hills beyond just as if some wonderful thing was about to come over the hills to tell them what their feelings meant. And the peace was so great and the moment so held that the World seemed to have stopped breathing, and something superhuman to have poured out a cup of stillness. And she called it Liquid Velvet. A Liquid Velvet moment. And I understood.

It is Columbine who watches that beautiful comedy of the newly married, who steal about their house hand-in-hand, fearful of waking the very new servants, fearful of creaking the boards as they gaze enraptured on the very new furniture, looking with joy on the very new pots and pans in the kitchen, turning the electric lights up and down all over the place to see the effect in their new bedroom. And he has a dreadful brooch for her hidden where he keeps his razors; and she has knitted him a tie he will have to wear. But it is all perfectly beautiful.

Someone wrote the other day that people who read are more interested, nowadays, in business than in love, and I'm so sorry for that man. He is more blind than I thought anybody could be. Business may be the means to an end, but Love is the beginning and the end. And it is just at this season that Love makes business; hence the shops full of gifts. Imagine a poet writing:

"Cent. per cent. the moon is rising,
Watch the stocks upon the bank;
Rubber shares are too surprising,
Speculators are surmising
Who the deuce they have to thank!"

No one can get a heartbeat out of that, and whatever your business man says, he knows he gets all the good in his life out of heartbeats.

So this Christmas Spirit creeps about the world, mocked at, scorned, but alive yet. And you who feel these things may one night see this quaint quartet at work, perhaps for a second at the corner of your street, perhaps just vanishing down the drive, or moving swiftly down a country lane. And you may say wonderingly: "It is a cobweb, a moth, and the branch of a tree, and the starlight makes them look like—like something I remember."

But I tell you who they are—Harlequin, Columbine, Clown and Pantaloon. And if you hear a child's laugh ring out suddenly, and it brings a new, quick emotion, one of them has conquered you!

The spirit of Christmas doesn't cling to presents in proportion to their cost—unless you are very rich; and if you are very rich the voice of the jeweler and of the furrier and of the motor car maker will seem to you as wise as the word of a happy poor man, though he were a philosopher.

Simple and genuine and glad—strike these notes and the chimes will be very melodiously for you and for those whom you try to make happy. And remember, you can't feign Christmas without being caught as an impostor, both by your own conscience and by the feelings of those about you. The very value of Christmas is that it puts the genuineness of everybody to an unerring test.

NEVER TIRES

Of the Food That Restored Her to Health.

"Something was making me ill and I didn't know the cause," writes a Colo. young lady: "For two years I was thin and sickly, suffering from indigestion and inflammatory rheumatism.

"I had tried different kinds of diet, and many of the remedies recommended, but got no better.

"Finally, Mother suggested that I try Grape-Nuts, and I began at once, eating it with a little cream or milk. A change for the better began at once.

"To-day I am well and am gaining weight and strength all the time. I've gained 10 lbs. in the last five weeks and do not suffer any more from indigestion, and the rheumatism is all gone.

"I know it is to Grape-Nuts alone that I owe my restored health. I still eat the food twice a day and never tire of it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The flavour of Grape-Nuts is peculiar to itself. It is neutral, not too sweet and has an agreeable, healthful quality that never grows tiresome.

One of the sources of rheumatism is from overloading the system with acid material, the result of imperfect digestion and assimilation.

As soon as improper food is abandoned and Grape-Nuts is taken regularly, digestion is made strong, the organs do their work of building up good red blood cells and of carrying away the excess of disease-making material from the system.

The result is a certain and steady return to normal health and mental activity. "There's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Annie Gattle, a fellow-passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers. Mrs. Wellington hears Little Jimmie's voice. Later she meets Mrs. Whitcomb. Mallory reports to Marjorie his failure to find a preacher. They decide to pretend a quarrel and Mallory finds a vacant berth. Mrs. Jimmie discovers Wellington on the train. Mallory again makes an unsuccessful hunt for a preacher. Dr. Temple poses as a physician. Mrs. Temple is induced by Mrs. Wellington to smoke a cigar. Sight of preacher on a station platform raises Mallory's hopes, but he takes another train. Missing hand baggage compels the couple to borrow from passengers. Jimmie gets a cinder in his eye and Mrs. Jimmie gives first aid. Coolness is then resumed. Still no clergyman. More borrowing. Dr. Temple puzzled by behavior of different couples. Marjorie's jealousy aroused by Mallory's baseball jargon. Marjorie suggests wrecking the train in hopes that accident will produce a preacher. Also tries to induce conductor to hold the train so she can shop. Marjorie's dog is missing. She pulls the cord, stopping the train. Conductor restores dog and lovers quarrel. Lathrop wires for a preacher to marry him and Miss Gattle. Mallory tells Lathrop of his predicament and arranges to borrow the preacher. Kitty Lewellyn, former sweetheart of Mallory's, appears and arouses Marjorie's jealousy. Preacher boards train. After marrying Lathrop and Miss Gattle the preacher escapes Mallory by leaping from moving train. Mallory's dejection moves Marjorie to reconciliation. The last day on the train brings Mallory the fear of missing his transport. Mallory gets a Nevada marriage license. Marjorie refuses to be married by a divorce drummer.

CHAPTER XXXV—Continued.

Dr. Temple and Mrs. Temple looked at each other in dismay, then at the flask and the cigars, then at the Wellingtons, then they stammered: "Thank you so much," and sank back.

Wellington stared at his wife: "Lucretia are you sincere?"

"Jimmie, I promise you I'll never smoke another cigar."

"My love!" he cried, and seized her hand. "You know I always said you were a queen among women, Lucretia."

She beamed back at him: "And you always were the prince of good fellows, Jimmie." Then she almost blushed as she murmured, almost shyly: "May I pour your coffee for you again this morning?"

"For life," he whispered, and they moved up the aisle, arm in arm, bumping from seat to seat and not knowing it.

When Mrs. Whitcomb, seated in the dining-car, saw Mrs. Little Jimmie pour Mr. Little Jimmie's coffee, she choked on hers. She vowed that she would not permit those odious Wellingtons to make fools of her and her Sammy. She resolved to telegraph Sammy that she had changed her mind about divorcing him, and order him to take the first train west and meet her half-way on her journey home.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

A Duel for a Bracelet.

All this while Marjorie and Mallory had sat watching, as kingfishers shadow a pool, the door wherethrough the girl with the bracelet must pass on her way to breakfast.

"She's taking forever with her toilet," sniffed Marjorie. "Probably trying to make a special impression on you."

"She's wasting her time," said Mallory. "But what if she brings her mother along? No, I guess her mother is too fat to get there and back."

"If her mother comes," Marjorie decided, "I'll hold her while you take the bracelet away from the—the—from that creature. Quick, here she comes now! Be brave!"

Mallory wore an aspect of arrant cowardice: "Er—ah—I—I—"

"You just grab her!" Marjorie explained. Then they relapsed into attitudes of impatient attention. Kathleen floated in and, seeing Mallory, she greeted him with radiant warmth: "Good morning!" and then, catching sight of Marjorie, gave her a "Good morning!" coated with ice. She bounced past and Mallory sat next, till Marjorie gave him a ferocious pinch, whereupon he leaped to his feet:

"Oh, Miss—er—Miss Kathleen." Kathleen whirled round with a most hospitable smile: "May I have a word with you?"

"Of course you can, you dear boy." Marjorie winced at this and writhed at what followed: "Shan't we take breakfast together?"

Mallory stuttered: "I—I—no, thank you—I've had breakfast."

Kathleen froze up again as she snapped: "With that—train-acquaintance, I suppose."

"Oh, no," Mallory amended, "I mean I haven't had breakfast."

But Kathleen scowled with a jealousy of her own: "You seem to be getting along famously for mere train-acquaintances."

"Oh, that's all we are, and hardly that," Mallory hastened to say with too much truth. "Sit down here a moment, won't you?"

"No, no, I haven't time," she said, and sat down. "Mamma will be waiting for me. You haven't been in to see her yet?"

"No. You see—"

"She cried all night."

"For me?"

"No, for papa. He's such a good traveler—and he had such a good start. She really kept the whole car awake."

"Too bad," Mallory condoled, perfunctorily, then with sudden eagerness, and a trial at indifference: "I see you have that bracelet still."

"Of course, you dear fellow. I wouldn't be parted from it for worlds."

Marjorie gnashed her teeth, but Kathleen could not hear that. She gushed on: "And now we have met again! It looks like Fate, doesn't it?"

"It certainly does," Mallory assented, bitterly; then again, with zest: "Let me see that old bracelet, will you?"

He tried to lay hold of it, but Kathleen giggled coyly: "It's just an excuse to hold my hand." She swung her arm over the back of the seat coquettishly, and Marjorie made a desperate lunge at it, but missed, since Kathleen, finding that Mallory did not pursue the fugitive hand, brought it back at once and yielded it up:

"There—be careful, someone might look."

Mallory took her by the wrist in a giggerly manner, and said, "So that's the bracelet? Take it off, won't you?"

"Never!—it's wished on," Kathleen protested, sentimentally. "Don't you remember that evening in the moonlight?"

Mallory caught Marjorie's accusing eye and lost his head. He made a ferocious effort to snatch the bracelet off. When this onset failed, he had recourse to entreaty: "Just slip it off." Kathleen shook her head tantalizingly. Mallory urged more strenuously: "Please let me see it."

Kathleen shook her head with sophistication: "You'd never give it back. You'd pass it along to that—train-acquaintance."

"How can you think such a thing?" Mallory demurred, and once more made his appeal: "Please, please, slip it off."

"What on earth makes you so anxious?" Kathleen demanded, with sudden suspicion. Mallory was stumped, till an inspiration came to him: "I'd like to—to get you a nicer one. That one isn't good enough for you."

Here was an argument that Kathleen could appreciate. "Oh, how sweet of you, Harry," she gurgled, and had the bracelet down to her knuckles, when a sudden instinct checked her: "When you bring the other, you can have this."

She pushed the circlet back, and Mallory's hopes sank at the gesture. He grew frantic at being eternally frustrated in his plans. He caught Kathleen's arm and, while his words pleaded, his hands tugged: "Please—please let me take it—for the measure—you know!"

Kathleen read the determination in his fierce eyes, and she struggled furiously: "Why, Richard—Chauncey!—er—Billy! I'm amazed at you! Let go or I'll scream!"

She rose and, twisting her arm from his grasp, confronted him with bewildered anger. Mallory cast toward Marjorie a look of surrender and despair. Marjorie laid her hand on her throat and in pantomime suggested that Mallory should throttle Kathleen, as he had promised.

But Mallory was incapable of further violence; and when Kathleen, with all her coquetry, bent down and murmured: "You are a very naughty boy, but come to breakfast and we'll talk it over," he was so addled that he answered: "Thanks, but I never eat breakfast."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Down Brakes!

Just as Kathleen flung her head in baffled vexation, and Mallory started to slink back to Marjorie, with another defeat, there came an abrupt shock as if that gigantic child to whom our railroad trains are toys, had reached down and laid violent hold on the Trans-American in full career.

Its smooth, swift flight became suddenly such a spasm of jars, shivers and thuds that Mallory cried:

"We're off the track."

He was sent flopping down the aisle like a bolster hurled through the car. He brought up with a sickening slam across the seat into which Marjorie had been jounced back with a breath-taking slam. And then Kathleen came flying backwards and landed in a heap on both of them.

Several of the other passengers were just returning from breakfast and they were shot and scattered all over the car as if a great chain of human beads had burst.

Women screamed, men yelled, and then while they were still struggling against the seats and one another, the train came to a halt.

"Thank God, we stopped in time!" Mallory gasped, as he tried to disengage himself and Marjorie from Kathleen.

The passengers began to regain their courage with their equilibrium. Little Jimmie Wellington had flown the whole length of the car, clinging to his wife as if she were Francesca da Rimini, and he Paolo, flitting through inferno. The flight ended at the stateroom door with such a thump that Mrs. Fosdick was sure a detective had come for her at last, and with a battering ram.

But when Jimmie got back breath enough to talk, he remembered the train-stopping excitement of the day before and called out:

"Has Mrs. Mallory lost that pup again?"

Everybody laughed uproariously at this. People will laugh at anything or nothing when they have been frightened almost to death and suddenly relieved of anxiety.

Everybody was cracking a joke at Marjorie's expense. Everybody felt a good-natured grudge against her for being such a mystery. The car was ringing with hilarity, when the porter came stumbling in and paused at the door, with eyes all white, hands waving frantically, and lips flapping like flannel, in a vain effort to speak.

"What's the matter with you, porter? Are you trying to crow?"

Everybody roared at this, till the porter finally managed to articulate:

"T-t-t-train rob-rob-robbers!"

Silence shut down as if the whole crowd had been smitten with paralysis. From somewhere outside and ahead came a pop-popping as of firecrackers. Everybody thought, "Revolvers!" The reports were mingled with barbaric yells that turned the marrow in every bone to snow.

These regions are full of historic terror. All along the Nevada route the conductor, the brakemen and old travelers had pointed out scene after scene where the Indians had slaked the thirst of the arid land with white man's blood. Ashton, who had traveled this way many times, had made himself fascinatingly horrifying the evening before and ruined several breakfasts that morning in the dining-car, by regaling the passengers with stories of pioneer ordeals, men and women massacred in burning wagons, or dragged away to fiendish cruelty and obscene torture, staked out supine on burning wastes with eyelids cut off, bound down within reach of rattlesnakes, subjected to every misery that human deviltry could devise.

Ashton had brought his fellow passengers to a state of ecstatic excitability, and, like many a recounter of burglar stories at night, had tuned his own nerves to high tension.

The violent stopping of the train, the heart-shaking yells and shots outside, found the passengers already apt to respond without delay to the appeals of fright. After the first hush of dread, came the reaction to panic.

Each passenger showed his own panic in his own way. Ashton whirled round and round, like a horse with the blind staggers, then bolted down the aisle, knocking aside men and women. He climbed on a seat, pulled down an upper berth, and, scrambling into it, tried to shut it on himself. Mrs. Whitcomb was so frightened that she assailed Ashton with fury and seizing his feet, dragged him back into the aisle, and beat him with her fists, demanding that he protect her and save her for Sammy's sake.

Mrs. Fosdick, rushing out of her stateroom and not finding her luscious-eyed husband, laid hold of Jimmie Wellington and ordered him to go to the rescue of her spouse. Mrs. Wellington tore her hands loose, crying: "Let him go, madam. He has a wife of his own to defend."

Jimmie was trying to pour out dying messages, and only sputtering, forgetting that he had put his watch in his mouth to hide it, though its chain was still attached to his waistcoat.

Anne Gattle, who had read much about Chinese atrocities to missionaries, gave herself up to death, yet rejoiced greatly that she had provided a timely man to lean on and should not have to enter Paradise a spinster, providing she could manage to convert Ira in the next few seconds, before it was everlastingly too late. She was begging her first heathen to join her in a gospel hymn. But Ira was roaring curses like a pirate captain in a hurricane, and swearing that the villains should not rob him of his bride.

Mrs. Temple wrung her twitching hands and tried to drag her husband to his knees, crying:

"Oh, Walter, Walter, won't you please say a prayer?—a good strong prayer?"

But the preacher was so confused that he answered: "What's the use of prayer in an emergency like this?"

"Walter!" she shrieked.

"I'm on my va-vacation, you know," he stammered.

Oldest Almanac.

The oldest almanac in existence is the "Almanach National," which has been issued by the French government since 1686. Its name has been changed a good many times during its career of 225 years. Originally the "Almanach Royal," it became "National" in 1793, "Imperial" in 1805 and reverted to its original name nine years later. Since then the title has been altered four times. Like most publications of this sort, the "Almanach National" has grown bulky with advancing years. The first issue contained 45 pages, as compared with 1,550 pages in the current issue.

"My wife is always bringing home so much toothpowder," complained a man the other day to a friend. "It's a waste of money. As for me I just take the bathtub cleanser and scrub my teeth."

The pair were walking down Chestnut street and his companion stopped in amazement. "What! Doesn't it hurt your teeth and gums, too?" he exclaimed almost in horror.

"No," came back the surprising reply. "You see they're the kind you buy at the dentist's."

Gender.

A woman teacher was explaining gender to a grade of young children as visitors entered. They begged her to continue, as they would be delighted to hear the children's replies.

"Children," she asked, "what is 'girl,' 'woman,' 'man'?"

One little hand was so eager, she appealed to the owner proudly.

"Well, Artie?"

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyzer

AN UGLY CASE

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

AT six in the morning, Vaillant, the man who threw the bomb in the Chamber of Deputies, had been executed, and I had been compelled to attend this hideous function. I had not been to bed. I reached my office an hour later, very tired, and determined, if possible, to retire early. Up to four o'clock nothing bad occurred to prevent my having a night's rest, when I received the following note:

> "Dear Goron: I expect you to dinner to-night. Meet me at Pousset's at half-past seven. Serious business.
>
> "ARMAND."

Even without the last two words, I would have guessed that something had gone wrong. My friend's usually bold writing appeared thin and shaky; and he, the exuberant man, who would write three pages to say what others express in three lines, had adopted a laconic style. Yes, that note foreboded trouble—if not worse—and I scribbled a line to say that I would meet him at the appointed hour.

Armand P—— and I were old chums. Both born in Rennes, we were educated at the same college, and, although in later years our ways lay in different directions, our friendship never changed.

Armand was the son of a retired stock-broker, and had inherited about one hundred thousand dollars from his mother, who died a year after he was born. He had a cousin, Marceline, whom he loved; and on the day he came of age he informed his father and me that he intended to marry her. I shall never forget that date, because it was the only time he and I quarreled.

His father, I know, was strongly opposed to marriages between members of the same family. When he remonstrated with Armand, and the latter appealed to me, I sided with the father, and, after a stormy scene, induced my friend to give up his idea.

Marceline was not the wife for the good-natured Armand, and I was glad when that danger was past. Two years later he married a lady he had met at Royat, and bought a pretty villa near Ville d'Avray, where I sometimes paid them a visit on a Sunday afternoon.

Unfortunately, this union did not turn out well. Madame P—— was rather bigoted, and, being of a highly nervous temperament, her husband's boisterousness and his loud laughter seemed to upset her. These two had no thoughts in common, and after a while my visits to Ville d'Avray stopped altogether.

As to Marceline, she had married a cavalry captain, who soon afterward was killed by a fall from his horse, leaving her a limited income and a house at Versailles. From Ville d'Avray to Versailles is but a twenty-minutes' drive, and I knew that Armand, since the captain's death, spent much of his time with Marceline.

When I reached Pousset's and saw Armand I looked at him in surprise. Hollow-cheeked, pale, with sunken, lack-luster eyes, I hardly recognized my poor friend. He rose when he saw me, walked with me to the door, and, hailing a cab, told the man to drive to Voisin's.

"Is it a dinner-party?" I asked.

"No," he said. It was the first word he had spoken.

At Voisin's he led the way to a private room on the first floor. I saw he had ordered the dinner and that the menu had been compiled with his usual skill.

"I wanted to be alone with you," he said, "and here we can talk undisturbed."

I was hungry and quite prepared to do honor to Voisin's cuisine, but before I had swallowed my first spoonful of soup, I noticed that the waiter had placed before Armand a boiled egg and a glass of milk.

"Are you going to make your dinner off that?"

"Yes," he replied with a painful smile, "but don't trouble about me. We will talk when you have finished."

The fish was served, and the man was about to leave the room when I called him back.

"That will do," I ordered; "you need not bring the remainder of the dinner."

Then, turning to Armand, I exclaimed:

"And now, for heaven's sake, speak!"

He walked up to me slowly, placed both hands on my shoulders, and in a strained voice asked:

"Did you see Vaillant before he was led to execution?"

"I did. Why?"

"Because you will then have beheld two condemned men in one day—Vaillant this morning, me to-night!"

"Armand," I cried, "are you mad?"

"No, I am not mad. I am—"

I saw he was nearly fainting, and led him to the sofa.

"I feel better, old chap," he said after a while, "and, now, I have to impart to you a fearful secret, which the chief of the detective police must ignore. It is not from him, but from the faithful friend, and from the clever detective, that I claim assistance. Goron, I am being slowly poisoned."

I was speechless with amazement. He continued:

"I want you to find out the culprit, and I know you will. But you will give me your word of honor that no harm shall befall the murderer."

"My dear Armand—" I began.

"Wait till I have finished—until I have told you the names of two persons, one of whom is poisoning me. Yes, there are only two."

He gave a sob, and, after an uncanny silence, suddenly screamed out:

"Goron, either my wife, or Marceline, my cousin, is the murderess! You may well shudder. And now you will understand why the chief of police may not know of the affair, and why neither of these women may be harmed. They are sacred to me. For one bears my name; and the other, the other—I have loved all my life!"

I battled long; but as my friend's life was at stake, I reluctantly yielded, and promised to help solve the mystery without injuring the women.

"Thank you," he whispered, "I shall now die happy."

"No," I interrupted him, "you will not die. Heaven knows what is lurking behind all this, and what startling discovery I may make. But you will have to place yourself unreservedly in my hands, and obey my instructions without questioning my motives."

"I will."

"Then tell me more about your suspicions."

"You call them 'suspicions?' Look here, Goron, two months ago I was a strong man. And now! About six weeks ago, my health suddenly began to fail. I experienced burning pains in the digestive organs, and a disagreeable taste in my mouth after meals. I consulted my medical man, who told me it was a form of indigestion, and prescribed a treatment which I followed. But my condition grew slowly worse, and for the last fortnight I have been sustaining myself on three eggs a day and a little milk.

"I consulted Dr. L—— and Professor G——, renowned specialists. They took a big fee, and informed me that my medical man's diagnosis was right. Until that moment the idea of poisoning had never entered my mind until by a singular coincidence, I happened to read the report of a poisoning case in Milan, where a man had been systematically administering arsenic to his victims. I was struck by the similarity of the symptoms described with what I myself experienced, except that one of the victims had dark spots on his body.

"Goron, the next night when I undressed I discovered dark spots on my thighs! It flashed upon me that I, too, was being poisoned, and, under an assumed name, I went to the Hotel Dieu hospital, where I told the consulting physician that I feared I had inadvertently swallowed a dose of arsenic. He did not seem to believe my story, but as I accused no one, he made the necessary examination, and after a few days informed me that I had really taken poison, and prescribed the proper remedy."

"And then?" I asked.

"And then—I knew that only Jeanne or Marceline could have been guilty of this horrible crime. Jeanne and I, as you know, are not happy; and I am only too glad to spend a few hours with Marceline. Sometimes I lunch with her, at others I invite myself to dinner—she is always glad to see me. And, during the last week, I have taken all my meals at home or at my cousin's."

"And these pains, and the nasty taste, did you notice them after you lunched or dined at your house, or at Marceline's?"

"I knew you would ask me that. And it is there that the mystery comes in, for those very same symptoms show themselves when I return from my cousin's and when I stay at home."

"So that you are inclined to suspect the two women?"

"I don't know. It is too terrible."

"Is Jeanne on good terms with Marceline?"

"No."

"Does your wife expect you back to-night?"

"Yes."

"Then send her a telegram that you are detained in town. To-night you stay with me, and to-morrow I will take you somewhere where you will be safe. But I have a few more questions to ask. What do your wife and Marceline say about your altered appearance?"

"They seem very concerned about me, and are anxious to do all they can."

"Frankly—whom do you suspect?"

"Sometimes I think it is Marceline; sometimes I think it is my wife. It is horrible."

"Yes, it is horrible. Has there ever been any real trouble between you and either of them?"

"Never."

"Is your life insured?"

"Yes."

"In anyone's name?"

"Yes, in Marceline's."

He colored slightly, and then said:

"You see, old chap, Marceline is not rich, and, strictly between ourselves, she is a bit of a gambler. She bets on horses, and, occasionally, dabbles in stocks. She has already cost me a rather big amount. So, one day, I insured my life for thirty thousand dollars in her name, in case anything happened to me."

I could not help starting slightly.

"When was that?"

"About a year ago."

"Have you told Marceline of this?"

"Yes."

"And your wife?"

"She knows I insured my life, but believes it was done in her name."

It was nearly eleven o'clock. I took Armand home with me, and the next morning conducted him to a sanatorium, near Chinon, where I had taken a little villa for my family, telling the director of the establishment that my friend was suffering from nervous prostration, and wanted absolute rest. I then sent him a valet—one of my own men—who every morning had to fetch him a bottle of fresh milk. I also gave him instructions respecting the bread, and even the eggs, for Armand's frugal meal, which had to be boiled in my friend's sitting-room.

Having taken these precautions, I made Armand write to his wife and to Marceline that by his doctor's orders he was taking a rest-cure.

I began by making a searching investigation, which brought to light such a startling fact that I went down to my friend, whom I found in bed, but looking less dejected. The burning pains were less intense and the dark spots were slowly disappearing.

"Armand," I said, "before touching upon the business that brings me here I must refer to the statement you made the other night that you experienced these ugly symptoms no matter where you took your meals. For a minute I had the idea that possibly both women might be implicated in the crime; but, in the absence of direct proof, I abandoned this hypothesis, especially as I have it on the highest medical authority that the effects of systematic arsenical poisoning do not show themselves till several hours later. And since every day you dined and lunched either at home or at Marceline's, we cannot draw any inference as to where the poison was administered.

"And now," I continued, "let us talk of Marceline. Did you know that her brother Gaston—the young scamp—is back in Paris?"

"Yes, I did."

"Have you ever met him?"

"A few months ago I saw him at his sister's, and the next morning he borrowed one hundred dollars from me. Since that day I have never come across him."

"And his sister?"

"She has nothing more to do with him."

"Are you certain of that?"

"Quite certain."

"Then let me tell you that not only her own money but the sums you give her go into that fellow's pocket."

"It is impossible! What proofs have—"

"One moment. What was the last amount you gave Marceline, and on what date?"

"Four hundred dollars on the 19th of last month. But why do you ask?"

"Because the day following, Gaston, who, three days before, borrowed a dollar from Hippolyte, the waiter in the Cafe de France, paid four hundred dollars to the Vicomte de S——, to whom he had lost that amount in the gambling-club in the Rue Taitbout, of which he is one of the chief ornaments. I have a little list in my pocket of the sums this amiable youth lost and spent during the last six months. And you will find the total agree with what you gave Marceline and what she took out of her own pocket. Marceline herself is heavily in debt and owes money to her tradespeople. It is not she who gambles, but he; and you have been supplying him with the necessary funds."

Armand looked at me in speechless astonishment.

"Good heavens!" he exploded, "I will at once—"

"You will do nothing at all," I said, "until I give you permission. Leave the matter to me. Have you heard at all from your wife or Marceline?"

"Yes, Jeanne telegraphed yesterday that she is ill, but expects to be able to come and see me here in a couple of days. And half an hour before you came I received this note from Marceline:

> "Dear Armand," it said: "I am glad you are taking a rest-cure, and hope it will soon put you right. I hear Jeanne has influenza, so I will come for a few days to Chinon, to the Hotel de la Boule d'Or. If you are well enough, come and lunch with me at one o'clock.
>
> "MARCELINE."

My friend looked at me expectantly.

"What must I do?" he asked.

"My dear Armand," I said, "I know you are anxious to go to the heart of this terrible business, and so am I. Go to Marceline to-morrow. About one o'clock I shall come to the hotel to see you; as I am supposed to have missed you when I called here. Remember that you have not seen me, nor heard from me, for a long time. Marceline, of course, will ask me to luncheon. You will have your milk and eggs, which you must not touch. But, two or three minutes after we are at table, when you see me twirl my moustache, rise, and tell your cousin you feel faint and want to lie down. Have you understood?"

"Yes, quite."

The next day when I called at the Boule d'Or, Marceline insisted on my staying, and she herself placed a jug of milk and two boiled eggs before Armand. I gave the agreed signal, whereupon Armand at once rose and asked permission to rest a little while. As I expected, Marceline conducted him to the adjoining bedroom, and the instant she had gone I poured some of the milk from the jug into a small flask I had brought with me.

When Marceline returned she looked grave.

"I did not know Armand was so ill," I remarked. "I was surprised to hear he had gone to a sanatorium."

"Yes," she replied, "he seems really ill."

"This milk," I said, "looks delicious. We do not get it like that in Paris. Try it." And I poured her out a glass.

But she shook her head.

"No, I do not care for it. I never take milk."

She remained pensive, with her chin on her hand; suddenly she said:

"M. Goron, I have to ask you a great favor. Can I have a few minutes' private conversation with you any time next week?"

"With great pleasure," I replied.

This interview, to which I attached much importance, never came off.

On my return to town I immediately sent the flask I had brought with me from Chinon to the Municipal Laboratory to have the contents analyzed, and early the next morning received a short report stating that the milk did not contain the slightest trace of arsenic. I had just finished reading it when Armand was announced. He seemed greatly agitated.

"You here?" I called out. "Why did you leave Chinon without my permission?"

"I came up by the early train," he retorted, "to show you this. It came last night after you had left."

And he threw me a crumpled piece of paper.

It was a shockingly written, badly spelled, letter addressed to Monsieur Armand P——:

> "The woman you love is attempting your life. Be warned ere it is too late."

There was no signature.

I examined it long and carefully.

"What a calamity!" cried Armand in a hoarse voice.

"What is a calamity?" I asked.

"Why, this letter! Can't you see that the business has leaked out? Who can have sent this?"

"Armand, for a fairly intelligent man, you are not sharp. This letter gives us the last link we wanted, and it comes at the right moment. Listen carefully, and I will show you which are the points on which this mystery turns. My suspicions, I own, were at first directed against Marceline. Her love of money, and the knowledge that your death would bring her thirty thousand dollars, told against her. When, however, I heard of her brother's doings I changed my opinion. Women, my dear Armand, may be weak and foolish enough to impoverish themselves for their brothers, yet sisterly devotion will not lead them into crime. A woman will commit a murder for motives of her own, and sometimes, though very rarely, she will risk her neck for the man she loves—for her brother, never.

"This disposes of Marceline. And now it is your wife who stands before us as the accused person. Of her guilt I have little doubt, and that letter confirms what other suspicions I may have entertained. She penned that note herself, and her attempt to compromise Marceline tells its own tale. She wrote it with her left hand, and in the writing—otherwise excellently disguised—I detect her curious habit of putting the dots, not over the i's, but above the letters that follow. This, no doubt, escaped you. There remains only the serious question of what led her to this."

Armand was in deep thought.

"What will you do with her?" he at last said.

"You have my word she shall not be touched. But I have a duty to perform, and will perform it. By to-morrow night we shall be in possession of all the facts, and this ugly nightmare will have come to an end. Please return at once to Chinon, and wait till you hear from me."

My friend's villa in Ville d'Avray stood within its own grounds behind a cluster of trees that hid it from view. As Madame P—— had written to her husband that she was suffering from influenza, I went to the tobacconist's at the corner, and, having purchased a few cigars, inquired after Monsieur P——. He, I was told, was in Paris; but madame had not gone with him. Had she been ill? No, madame had been driving her ponies every day. He had just seen her enter the gates.

I went straight to the house, and, a few minutes later, Madame P—— came to me in the library.

"You here, M. Goron?" she exclaimed. "It is six months since we saw you. You are neglecting your friends."

She was still the same thin, old-maidish-looking little woman, with pale cheeks, pale hair, pale hands, and a curiously big voice, not in keeping with her small stature.

"Have you seen Armand?" she asked.

"Yes, I knew he was better, and I came here hoping to find him."

"No, he is still away. I could not go to him because I have only just recovered from an attack of influenza. Can I do anything for you?"

"Yes, you can render me a small service. I want to send a letter to some one, but not in my own writing. I want to sign it only. Will you allow me to dictate it to you?"

"Certainly."

She sat at her husband's desk, dipped her pen in the ink, and waited.

"The woman you love," I began, "is attempting—"

"—is attempting your life. Be warned—"

I could go no further.

With fear expressed in every line of her face, she rushed at me, seized both my arms in a convulsive grasp, and, throwing herself on the sofa, her face buried in the cushions, broke into peals of uncontrollable laughter. It was fearful.

After a while she grew calmer.

"Madame," I said, "will you—"

At the sound of my voice she jumped up and stood in front of me.

"No!" she screamed in a paroxysm of excitement, "don't speak, don't utter a word. Only listen. Yes, you know I wrote that letter. You guessed the whole truth. I can read it in your face. You have come to avenge Armand. But you shall listen to me. You shall know what I suffered, and why I became a murderess. M. Goron, have you ever heard of a woman killing a man because she loved him? Don't look at me surprised. I am not mad. I am quite sane. Had I been bereft of reason I should have suffered less.

"I love Armand as no woman ever before loved a man. He is kind, generous, and I would give my life for him any hour of the day. I loved him from the moment I first saw him, and, when we married, I wanted him to know all he was to me. But a curse seemed to rest on me. My stony features and my harsh voice repelled him; and when I tried to tell him how I worshipped him, and that I was pining for his affection, my tongue seemed paralyzed. Finally I gave up. And then I knew he was lost to me; and I had to see him spend half his days in the company of that flighty doll, his cousin. I resolved to kill myself, but I knew that he would marry that woman; and I swore that sooner than that he should die!"

I longed to have this painful interview over, and said:

"Madame, I have not come to arrest you, because Armand made me promise that if the crime should be brought home to you, you should not be harmed, so far as the law is concerned. In order to save my friend's life I am making the sacrifice of my duty; but I must insist on your obeying my injunctions."

She bowed her head, and it was decided that before the end of the week she should leave France. She at once proposed to go to the cholera-stricken district in Tonquin, where she could be useful, and I promised to see her safely on board the next outgoing steamer. She also signed a declaration to the effect that she was leaving her husband and her home, which would enable Armand to obtain a divorce without any trouble. As I rose to go, she stopped me.

"Allow me to make a last request. Don't tell Armand anything about my confession to you. He need not know what I have suffered. Will you promise it me?"

"I promise it."

"I thank you. Good-by, M. Goron; I shall not forget your kindness."

In less than a week she left for Tonquin, where she toiled night and day in the hospital. She died six months after her arrival, from overexertion.

Armand, I believe, married Marceline. I say "I believe," because that lady wrote me an indignant letter, wherein she said she would never forgive my suspicions of her. And she must have made Armand share her indignation, for I have neither seen him nor heard from him since.

Woman Faints at Movies and Loses a $25 Hat

The last one Mrs. Muckermann attended cost, besides the price of admission, one new $25 hat, black velvet, trimmed with small red roses.

The other night, after the Muckermann family had dinner at their home, at 6054 West Cabanne place, someone suggested a night of amusement at the "movies." The suggestion was adopted, and Mr. and Mrs. Muckermann, with a party of friends, adjourned to a theater.

The atmosphere of the place was bad. Mrs. Muckermann stood it as long as she could, and then fainted.

Her husband picked her up and started for home. A friend started for the Muckermann garage and got out the automobile. He met Muckermann about a block from the house, and the two lifted the unconscious woman into the car. In the exertion they knocked off Mrs. Muckermann's hat.

"Get her hat," said the friend.

"Oh, that'll be all right; get it later. Hurry up for the house," replied Muckermann, and they whirled off.

When Mrs. Muckermann revived she inquired for her hat. When told that it was lying in the gutter a block away she sent a searching party.

Muckermann and his friends dug up lanterns and electric torches and went after the hat. It was gone. A search until midnight failed to reveal the hat and the searchers were compelled to go home and break the news to Mrs. Muckermann.

But, determined to have that hat back, Mrs. Muckermann published an advertisement and will pay a liberal reward to the person who brings back the missing headgear.

Show Girls Dance "Bear" and "Tango" in Pulpit

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn.—Two chorus girls danced a ragtime dance on the platform of the pulpit of the Rev. G. L. Morrill in Minneapolis the other day, illustrating his sermon on "Praise Him With the Dance." The most amazing and bold dances were "put on the boards" by the two girls from a Minneapolis burlesque house and the audience fairly gasped at this.

The "Turkey Trot," the "Crab Crawl," the "Tortoise Tango," the "Jolly Wobble," the "Angle Worm Wriggle," the "Grizzly" and all others known to these two girls of the stage were danced.

Then began the Rev. Mr. Morrill's sermon.

"Now you have witnessed just how fashionable society carries on when it gets started," said the Rev. Mr. Morrill. "I admit there is a decent dance, a dance helpful to the body, pleasant to the mind and harmless to the soul, but these rag dances that you have witnessed, not at all exaggerated, will make the devil blush, and he would hesitate to introduce them into purgatory.

"There was a time when statues were made of graceful dancers, but today there is a crying demand for statutes against dancing which is disgraceful. The dancing whirlpool of society has drawn into its drowning depths many of the best craft that ever sailed life's sea. The dance you have witnessed has degenerated from devotion and diversion into dissipation and debauchery."

As the two chorus girls performed these "rag" dances, now and then a coin would fly toward the pulpit, while the big organ of the church pealed forth rag-time music to accompany the dance.

Stop Game of Cards to Get Marriage License

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—A suggestion from friends that they get married at once, made half in fun, it is said, caused John Patterson and Miss Emma Shepp to disturb a penuchle game in which John Rauch, county clerk, was playing. They sought Rauch in order to get a marriage license, and they aroused Mayor Shank from his slumbers shortly after midnight that the mayor might perform the ceremony.

It was not a full dress affair—far from it. The mayor was clad in a pair of trousers, his nightshirt and a Prince Albert coat, and also wore a pair of shoes, which were unlaced.

Patterson and Miss Shepp were out calling on friends, when some one suggested they get married at once. It was agreed it would be a "lark," and an automobile was called. Rauch's home was visited, and he was induced to leave a penachle game and go to the court house about 11:00 p. m. and issue a license.

"Let's get Mayor Shank," some one suggested.

"But the mayor is probably in bed," said another.

"That don't make any difference," replied the first. "No one but the mayor will do."

The couple, accompanied by three young women and a man, went to the mayor's home and with considerable difficulty aroused him. Rauch, William Brommer, a saloon keeper, and August Pohlman followed in an automobile, wishing to see the fun. Shortly after midnight the ceremony was performed and the couple said they would leave at once for a trip to Pittsburgh.

"John was feeling good and I thought we had better get married while he felt like it," the mayor says the bride explained.

Revolutionary Ghosts Stirred by Abbey Fire

NEW YORK.—Ghosts of a score of Central and South American revolutions were stirred from their lurking places in the arms-filled corners of Westminster Abbey's "what-not" store, No. 61 Front street, by a fire the other afternoon. Since 1830 it has been possible to get anything from a print of eighteenth century New York to a pound of "good mixed tea at 20 cents" in this store, but munitions of war have been its chief stock, and if seamen's gossip means anything filibusters have had good reason to know this for more than a generation.

Westminster Abbey—who got his strange name because his father, Jared Abbey, intended him for the church—watched the progress of the fire with tear-filled eyes.

"Every one's got a bug," he said, "and my bug is my business. I had things in there that you wouldn't take as a gift, but that I wouldn't have parted with for any price you could have offered."

Many of these things were ruined by smoke and water, but for the most part the damage was confined to flags and uniforms from half the countries in the world; to tenting and fishing tackle; to teas and coffees jumbled in with ship's paint; to prints and etchings, and to some ancient paintings of greater sentimental than artistic worth. Some $50,000 worth of arms and ammunition escaped harm.

Perhaps the most valuable relics owned by Abbey come under this last category.

The building occupied by Abbey was said by the police to be the oldest along Front street.

WHO'S WHO AND WHY

SPRING-RICE NEW BRITISH AMBASSADOR

It is said Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, the new British ambassador at Washington, like his predecessor, Mr. Bryce, believes the Panama canal problem is soluble, and that he is imbued with pronounced American sympathies.

Moreover, he was the principal lieutenant of his chief, the late Lord Pauncefote, in the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, on the subject of the Panama canal, the interpretation of which constitutes the basis of the differences which have lately arisen. Indeed, he is generally understood to have drafted the greater part, if not the whole, of that instrument.

His appointment, therefore, is particularly appropriate, and it is certain that the same diplomat who helped to negotiate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in the place of the objectionable Clayton-Bulwer agreement, with the object of promoting friendship between Great Britain and the United States, will now know how to construe in the happiest manner for both countries the questions which have arisen in connection with what is, after all, in a sense, his own offspring.

QUEEN DONS APRON; LABORS FOR POOR

The busiest of a small gathering of workers who were occupied the other day at the Imperial institute in unpacking, sorting and repacking many thousands of useful winter garments for the poor was Queen Mary. It was shortly after noon when her majesty arrived, and it was not until nearly 4 o'clock that the royal carriage arrived to take her back to Buckingham palace.

Throughout the whole of this time, with only a short interval for a little lunch at 1:30 o'clock, the queen, assisted by her ladies in waiting, Lady Bertha Dawkins and Lady Katherine Coke, and a few privileged gentlewomen, together with several old and trusted royal servants, was supervising this labor of love for the poor.

In setting this example to the women of England her majesty was no mere figurehead. She inspected every crate, bale and package as the men unpacked them in the north gallery of the institute, and was as busy and enthusiastic about her work as any of her little band of helpers.

Then, further equipping herself with a business-like apron over the front of her walking skirt and a pair of small but serviceable scissors, she set to work and directed the operations.

BRAKEMAN ELECTED COUNTY TREASURER

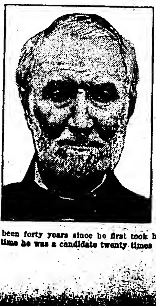
From helper in a round house to county treasurer is a part of the life story of Samuel J. Bryan, Democratic treasurer-elect of El Paso county, Colorado.

Crippled in a railroad wreck six years ago and so seriously injured that surgeons declared he could not survive, handicapped by lack of education, Bryan's steady climb up the ladder is referred to by his friends as an example of what pluck and perseverance will do. Bryan's friends gave him a plurality of nearly 1,000.

When he was working as a brakeman about six years ago, Bryan was knocked under the cars in a wreck. Both legs were cut off and other injuries were such that death was only a matter of hours, the surgeons declared.

But Bryan had a strong desire to live. He passed two years on a hospital cot, during which time he underwent eight operations. Then he decided to quit the dangerous work of railroading, but feared his lack of education would prove a big handicap. His wife urged him to devote his time to study, and between them they decided upon a course in bookkeeping and accounting.

PASSING OF UNIQUE UNCLE JOE CANNON

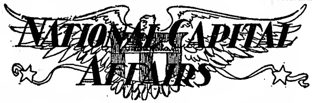


The defeat of Uncle Joe Cannon for re-election will remove from Congress one of the most picturesque characters in the last half century of American politics. Whatever storms may have arisen over Mr. Cannon's official acts and political opinions, and they have been many in recent years, nobody ever attempted to dispute the fact that Uncle Joe has stood alone, a unique figure in the life of the national capital.

Able, forceful, a born fighter and one of the homeliest and most lovable of men, the passing of Uncle Joe Cannon and his inseparable cigar will leave a void, at least for folks who thought they could see in him the typical rough and ready American politician of earlier days.

When the former speaker closes his public career on March 4, 1913, he will have served longer as a member of the house of representatives than any other man. It will have been forty years since he first took his seat in that body, and during that time he was a candidate twenty times and elected nineteen times.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS



Feared Nebraska May Succeed Texas as Hoodoo

WASHINGTON.—"Naval officers are guessing whether the United States battleship Nebraska, which ran upon an uncharted shoal a short time ago, is going to take the place of the ill-fated Texas, later named San Marcos, which was the hoodoo ship of the navy," remarked Captain L. L. Darbey, a retired naval officer, the other day. "Ill luck pursued the Texas almost from the beginning, and it seemed that it was never out of trouble during all the time it was in commission.

"Before the Spanish-American war the Texas while being overhauled at the Brooklyn navy yard was sunk, because the yokes of its sea cocks were broken in the course of repairs, and the water poured in just as if the boat had been scuttled. The Texas sank, as everybody knows, and was raised as soon as possible. It was on that occasion that Captain Jack Phillips, one of the bravest and best naval officers, by the way, that ever trod a bridge, had some fun with Fighting Bob Evans, at that time commanding the Iowa. When the Texas was raised it was found that in the hull were thousands of eels that had been sucked through the open sea cocks. Knowing Captain Evans's fondness for eels Phillips had a lot of them sent over to the Iowa. He was somewhat surprised a day later to receive a note of acknowledgment from his brother officer, which read: 'The eels were fine, Jack; sink her again.'

"It was Jack Phillips, you may remember, who, after the great naval battle of Santiago, when the Spanish battleships were lying on the shores of Cuba smoking from the shot of the American ships, solemnly said to his men: 'Don't cheer, boys; the poor devils are dying.'"

Enterprising Sam Conserves the Natural Resources

IF Sam Lee should put a big gilt sign bearing the words, "Electrical Chinese Laundry," on the front of his little shop, at 3108 Fourteenth street, Northwest, any time in the near future, his customers in Mount Pleasant would not be at all surprised.

In fact, a number of those who intrust their negligee to the tender ministrations of the affable Celestial have been wondering for some time why Sam has neglected such a splendid opportunity for a bit of advertising.

But although Sam has been rejuvenated to the extent where he realizes that electrical power is much stronger, cheaper, and more efficient in the long run than the muscles and sinews of the human arms and back, he has not awakened to the wonders of the "ads."

Sam is wide-awake and alert, and in the "Mellican slang" he is "on the job." Therefore, when an enterprising salesman revealed the wonders of a new and ingenious device for iron'ng clothes at the cost of but little perspiration, less physical energy, practically no mental waste, and only a few cents a day in the cost of power, Sam said: "I buy him."

Now Sam irons with an electrical iron which saves him so many hundreds of steps a day between the stove and his ironing table. Further, the iron is so arranged that by pulling a string he releases a weight which bears down on the top of the iron and relieves him of that duty. Better still, the pulling of another string lifts the iron just the right height above the board and Sam does not have to lift it and put it on the old-fashioned iron holder.

He Wants a Wife, and Wants Her Double-Quick

AUGUUST SEYMORE, otherwise known as August Schaefelsky de Mukkadel de Castellane, one time dentist to the bey of Tunis and his harem, wants a wife, and wants her double-quick. He has from now until January 1 to persuade an American girl to marry him, or he will forfeit a legacy of $150,000 promised by a California woman.

An aunt, formerly of Oakland, Cal., told him five years ago that if he would earn "something worth while and capture an American for a wife," she would give him $150,000.

Seymore is a relative of the Castellane family made famous by the marital difficulties of Count Boni.

He is now in Washington, where he expects to remain until he finds "the woman" that his aunt told him he must have before he is entitled to her money. He has lectured, written, practiced dentistry and served in the French army. In a wife he would have a chum.

"I used to believe in my mother's view of marriage—the marriage of the eye—but I have come to the view of the marriage of reason," said Seymore. "Mother said that marriage progressed from the stage of catching, or buying, a woman to the wooing of a woman regarded in a nobler sense, and the winning of the wife.

"Now I feel that the marriage of the eye is the result of the sentimentality of youth and immaturity. Better is that marriage where the couple are partners, chums, sharing everything alike. I don't believe in the marriage where the man has the money and forces his wife to ask him for every cent she gets.

"Rather, there should be a balance of power, so that the man and the woman are on an absolutely equal footing as regards money, morals, pleasures and sorrows."

In Doubt as to Mr. Wilson's Mode of Locomotion

JUST at present Washington is wondering whether it will soon behold a president of the United States rolling leisurely by on his bicycle. It has just come out that the president-elect is fond of that manner of locomotion. He has gone on his vacation, and proposes to spend a part of it riding on his wheel. He has pedaled over many miles of English and continental roads in this fashion and likes it. Time was when Washington was filled with eminent men and women awheel, but they have all vanished save one, Assistant Secretary of State A. A. Adee. He is the permanent assistant secretary of state, a man who sticks to his own notions about things. Every summer he voyages to Europe and spends a month or so bicycling to places of interest.

If as president Gov. Wilson wants to "bike" around Washington, he will not want for good roads. They stretch in every direction, except toward Virginia. The secret service men who guard him, of course, would also have to be mounted, but that is only an incident. They have been accustomed to following the president on motorcycles and sometimes in an automobile of their own. If the new president takes to bicycling, however, official Washington will do likewise. That is a way official Washington has. If Gov. Wilson goes out much awheel, it will not be long before ambassadors and ministers and secretaries and military attaches will also be pedaling along the sleeky-oiled roads and dodging automobiles. Cabinet officials and congressmen will do likewise. The revival of bicycling among the well-to-do may be expected somewhat all over the country.

THE GOLDEN RULE.

The unhappiest mortals are those who are always looking up the faults of others. This is explained by the fact that they are trampling all over the Golden Rule, which enjoins upon one a friendly interpretation of another's life. It very often happens that a man will shut his eyes to a score of virtues merely to see one fault, and when he does that, and hangs a cloud over the other's life, he does the same for his own. This is not speculation; it is experience. Just notice how good you feel when you see the good points of a man and not the bad ones. There is a bank of flowers. Enjoy it—behold its beauties and enjoy the fragrance; don't go nosing among the tangled weeds looking for a snake. There is an old adage: "Look on the bright side, and if there is no bright side, burnish up the dark side." As to the Golden Rule—we would hate for a person to go snooping around, looking up our faults; and so we will not do it for another. When a great fault protrudes, denounce it, but not the man, for he may have a dozen virtues that outweigh it ten to one. Besides, the fault may not be the man's; and further, we might all act the same under the same conditions and circumstances.

As we are now in the annual season for colds, a word on the subject will be timely. A writer in the Physical Culture Magazine tells us there is much misconception regarding the origin of colds and that they are not caused by draughts, damp feet or exposure to the cold, but by an accumulation of waste materials in the system that, for some reason, have not been expelled in the normal manner. Exposure, dampness and draughts, says the writer, occasion the cold, but the condition of the system is the real cause of the malady. If the system is in a healthful condition, almost any amount of exposure may be experienced, and no ill results will follow, but one is much more susceptible to colds when the abnormal condition prevails. This condition is caused by the failure of the scavengers of the human body to properly perform their functions. The body is then in a semipoisoned state, and when in this state the cold is easily contracted. But it is not the exposure which is the cause of the cold. It is only the occasion—the last straw, and the real cause is to be found in the condition of the system.

We have been so often told that the whale fisheries are now extinct that we learn with surprise that 20,000 whales were captured last year in the waters of South Georgia, South Shetland, South America and Africa, and that other fishing fields yielded substantial catches, says the San Francisco Argonaut. Who would have thought that there were so many whales? But we are assured that in a few years' time there will be no whales left, thanks to the use of the deadly harpoon gun. The rorqual whale was safe under the old system. He was too swift and too fierce to approach in boats, but he is easily conquered by the harpoon fired out of a gun from the deck of a ship. The whale is not exactly a lovable animal, but it seems a pity that he should be exterminated, especially as we were under the impression that he was already exterminated.

A bad quarter of an hour is furnished the Germans by the report of one war correspondent that the swift and decisive victories of the Bulgars over the Turks were due to the superiority of the Crensot French guns over the German Krupps used by the Turks. Of course the Krupp people will scientifically demonstrate the untruth of this. However the gun controversy may turn out, we think the chief factor of Bulgarian success lay in their adoption of old Gen. N. B. Forrest's statement that the art of war consists of "gittin' thar first with the most men."

"The slaughter of the innocents" as applied to the killing of children in the streets of New York is sometimes criticized as a sensational phrase, says the New York World. By what other term can the killing of 178 children by vehicles in the city during the last ten months be designated? The figures show the extent to which traffic murder is tolerated and condoned as the price of industrial progress.

HOUSE IS STARTLED

MARRIAGE OF WHITES TO NEGROES BITTERLY ARRAIGNED BY GEORGIAN.

HITS AT IT BY RESOLUTION

Representative Roddenberry Declares Practice Is Averse to Every Sentiment of Pure American Spirit—Will Result in Bloody War.

Washington, Dec. 13.—One of the most fiery speeches heard in the house of representatives in over fifty years resulted here Wednesday from the recent marriage of "Jack" Johnson, negro prize fighter, to Lucille Cameron, a white girl, in Chicago.

After introducing a resolution to amend the Constitution to forbid the marriage of negroes and persons of any other color, Representative S. A. Roddenberry of Georgia denounced such unions as "black slavery;" characterized the action of the state of Illinois in permitting the marriage in question as "damning" and predicted that the practice would plunge the United States into as bloody a war as it has ever passed through.

Mr. Roddenberry's resolution was as follows:

"That intermarriage between negroes or persons of color and Caucasion or any other character of persons within the United States or any territory under their jurisdiction is forever prohibited, and the term 'negroes or persons of color' as here employed shall be held to mean any and all persons of African descent or having any trace of African or negro blood.

"We have heard a great deal in late days about the white slave traffic and its enormity in New York and Chicago," said Mr. Roddenberry. "Terrific and revolting as it is, it is not so revolting as that in Chicago. White girls of this country are made the slaves of an African brute, sanctioned by the laws of the state and solemnized by the form of a marriage ceremony.

"We see an African with much brutal force, with no moral character, with no stamina, entering the office of a legal officer in that city, and calling on him to issue—'to Jack Johnson!'—a marriage license to wed a young American woman of our own blood, our own race, our own color. The young officer is directed to issue to the brute a legal certificate permitting a white woman in these days to be bound in the wedlock of black slavery.

"The negro question stands out in the example of Johnson's marriage in Chicago as presenting to you as grave a negro question as ever confronted your brethren in the south.

"Do you propose that in all the future years the negro men can seize upon some weak minded woman of our race, who can tantalize her, who can overpersuade her and contract her to wedlock—do you propose that these things shall go sanctioned by laws of your states?

"It is contrary and averse to every sentiment of pure American spirit. It is contrary and averse to the very principles of a pure Saxon government. It is subversive of social peace. It is destructive of moral supremacy, and ultimately it will bring this country to a conflict as bloody and as fatal as ever the other days have produced.

Servia Recalls Her Minister.

London, Dec. 14.—The Austro-Servian situation was thrown into utter confusion when the Servian minister to Austria, M. Simica, was recalled by imperative order from Belgrade Thursday. Great excitement prevailed in Vienna, where war with Servia is regarded as a certainty.

Athens, Greece, Dec. 14.—It was semi-officially confirmed Thursday that Black sea Turks have been burning villages and massacring the inhabitants in the neighborhood of Gallipoli and Lalos.

T. R. PROGRAM IS OUT

COLONEL OUTLINES POLICY AT PROGRESSIVE MEET.

"Bull Moosers" Hold Three-Day Session in Chicago—Plans for Next Four Years.

Chicago, Dec. 11.—Col. Theodore Roosevelt in Chicago Monday, in the first public utterance on political matters he has made since the election, outlined the Roosevelt program for the next four years as follows:

1. An irreconcilable fight to the bitter end with the Republicans.
2. No "trafficking or dickering" with either of the old parties in the legislatures of the states which have elected Progressive members.
3. A uniform program of legislation, embodying all the pledges of the Progressive national platform, to be submitted to every legislature in which a Progressive member will have a seat.
4. Continued and unceasing assaults on the Republican party as an "organization of such a character that no honest man can be in it."
5. An immediate "smoking out" of all Republicans who profess a "lip loyalty" to the Progressive cause. "Either make them show up or back up," said Mr. Roosevelt.
6. The writing into the laws of all states a provision for the recall of judicial decisions.

A conference, presided over by Representative Joseph M. Carter of Champaign, was the first formal occurrence of the three-day "pow-wow" of national "Bull Moose" leaders.

SENT LETTER TO WILSON

Dover, N. J., Dec. 11.—Charged with sending "Black Hand" letters to Gov. Woodrow Wilson threatening him with the same treatment that was meted out to Colonel Roosevelt, unless he paid them $5,000 by November 24, Jacob Dune, Peter Dune and Seeley Davenport were arrested in the mountains near Ford Mine by Deputy United States Marshal Breckmse and Post Office Inspectors R. Francis Betier of New York and Clinton A. Larabee of Philadelphia.

The letter was sent to the governor at Trenton.

It stated that the trio were members of the same "Black Hand" gang that had handled the cases of President McKinley and former President Roosevelt.

$1,500,000 IS FIRE LOSS

Cincinnati Suffers Disastrous Conflagration in Heart of the Business District.

Cincinnati, Dec. 12.—Threatening to destroy the entire business block bounded by Walnut street, Vine street, Fourth avenue and Fifth avenue, fire broke out in the rear of the Gibson house early after eight o'clock Tuesday night, destroying the Gibson house, Pousar's cafe, the building occupied by the Mecca cafe, the Bendigs-Lothman building on Fourth avenue, the Missouri Pacific Railway building on Walnut street, the W. L. Douglas Shoe company building on Walnut street, an abandoned building, several floors of the Union Trust building at Fourth avenue and Walnut street, part of the Honing hotel and part of the Johnston building.

The loss of property as a whole is roughly estimated at $1,500,000.

Bowman Ousted From House.

Washington, Dec. 14.—Representative Charles C. Bowman of the Eleventh Pennsylvania district was unseated by the house of representatives by the passage, 158 to 118, of a resolution declaring that corrupt practices had been used in his election in 1910.

At the same time the house refused, 181 to 88, to seat George R. McLean, his Democratic opponent.

Fell 3,000 Feet in 1895; Dies.

TELLS OF BIG LOANS

WITNESS BEFORE PUJO'S COMMITTEE TESTIFIES "MONEY TRUST" MAKES 20 PER CT.

$50,000,000 IS LENT DAILY

Investigators of Alleged Wall Street Combine Think Placing of Fixed Rate of Interest Would Put End to Trouble.

Washington, Dec. 14.—Testifying at the house money trust investigation Thursday, J.H. Griesel of Griesel & Rogers said that "millions and millions of dollars are loaned over the telephone in the course of regular business by the New York banks." Differences between the New York Stock exchange and the Consolidated Stock exchange and the effect of the stock exchange's bar against Consolidated brokers also were aired. Half a dozen members of the Consolidated exchange, including President Miguel DeAguero, were examined by Samuel Untermyer, counsel for the committee. They explained that under the rules of the New York Stock exchange they were absolutely prohibited from doing any business with members of that organization, and charged that their business had been curtailed by the prohibition.

Prior to the examination of the Consolidated exchange witnesses, the committee heard several money brokers operating in the "loan crowd" on the New York Stock exchange. They testified that an enforced low rate of interest would prevent the movement of money toward New York from country banks, when the money was needed at home points.

"Sometimes," Mr. Griesel said, "$3,500,000 or $4,000,000 is lent within fifteen or twenty minutes, this volume of transactions serving as a basis for rates on renewal of loans. I have lent sometimes $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 a day and borrowed perhaps $15,000,000 on a single day. I have lent as high as $35,000,000. I represent the borrower rather than the lender and of course I get the benefit in the loaning transactions."

Mr. Griesel said J. P. Morgan & Co. frequently loan at the exchanges, though sometimes several months may elapse between their transactions. He said the principal lenders were the National City bank, the Chase National and the Bank of Commerce.

C. W. Turner, loan broker for the National City bank, said that the bank be represented never charged more than six per cent. on loans, no matter what the rate on call money might be on the exchange.

"What would be the result if all the banks did that?" asked Mr. Untermyer.

"Why, money would not be attracted to New York," answered Mr. Turner. He said that on the day recently when money was at 20 per cent. he loaned for the account of the National City bank $3,000,000 at six per cent. He described the general method of making loans on the floor of the exchange and said that the total daily loans on the exchange would amount to $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. He said, however, that was merely an estimate and that there are no statistics available to show the total daily loans on stock exchange securities.

"JIM CROW" LAW IS UPHELD

Supreme Court of Mississippi Rules That It Applies to All Through Sleeping Cars.

Jackson, Miss., Dec. 11.—The Supreme court of Mississippi decided that the so-called "Jim Crow" law applies in this state to through sleeping cars as well as day coaches. This decision was handed down in the suit of Miss Pearl Morris, who won a verdict against the Alabama & Vicksburg railroad for $15,000 because its employes refused to eject three negroes from a sleeping car in which she was riding. The court held that the $15,000 damages was excessive, but suggested a verdict of $2,000.

The decision says that if negroes are to ride in sleeping cars in Mississippi they must be furnished with separate cars.

ADMITS KILLING PETROSINI

Italian, Condemned to Death, Says He Helped Gang Kill Noted Gotham Detective.

Montreal, Que., Dec. 14.—Carlo Baptista, an Italian who is to be hanged here on December 20 for murder, confessed to the police that he was one of the gang that plotted the assassination of Joseph Petrosini, the famous New York detective who was shot to death in Palermo, Sicily, on March 12, 1909.

The prisoner revealed the names of several other members of the Camorra that engineered the assassination. He said they had deserted him and refused to contribute for his defense and he wanted them hunted down.

Fire Loss Is $1,000,000.

Bayonne, N. J., Dec. 14.—Fire Thursday destroyed three huge oil tanks and a large building, the property of the Standard Oil company. The loss is estimated at $1,000,000. The building contained valuable machinery.

Kansas Gets $33,000 Dexter Tax.

Topeka, Kan., Dec. 14.—The state of Kansas received an inheritance tax of $33,000 on the $2,000,000 estate of the late Henry Dexter of New York Thursday. Dexter when he died owned $600,000 in Kansas railroad stock.

PROTEST CANAL TOLL

ENGLAND DENIES U. S. RIGHT TO FREE PASSAGE OF SHIPS.

Great Britain Declares Concession to Vessels of This Country Is a Clear Violation of Treaties.

Washington, Dec. 11.—Great Britain filed its official protest against the principle of free tolls for American ships in an American canal Monday night with Secretary of State Knox and simultaneously in the British parliament, the main points in the protest being that such free tolls are a clear violation of the Clayton-Bulwer and Hay-Pauncefote treaties.

The case of Great Britain was prepared by Sir Edward Grey, minister of foreign affairs, and was communicated to Secretary Knox by Mr. James Bryce, the British ambassador, accompanied by the counsellor of the British embassy, Mr. Mitchell Innes.

It is only a fiction of diplomacy to say that the protest was made known here only now. The president has been aware of the protest, and has been considering it for some weeks, according to two of his cabinet officers, and he has had the answer under advisement.

Summarized, this government is from now on officially engaged on the solution of two questions arising out of the protest:

First—Whether it presents an arbitrable question.

Second—Whether the United States will submit the matter to arbitration.

NEWS FROM FAR AND NEAR

Baldwin, Mich., Dec. 12.—O. M. Auerbach of Chicago, an '09 Princeton graduate, was sentenced to life imprisonment Monday at Jackson for the murder of his employer, Harry W. Fisher, former Chicago promoter.

Plymouth, Dec. 12.—An unknown steamer with her entire crew lies at the bottom of the English channel as the result of a collision with the British 30,000-ton dreadnought Centurion.

The disaster came with terrific suddenness in the dark hours of Tuesday morning. The apparently lost vessel attempted to cross the bows of the battleship, which was steaming at 20 knots, and sank before the Centurion could render help.

Los Angeles, Cal., Dec. 12.—After being knocked down twice in the sixteenth round, Jim Flynn was in such a helpless state that Referee Charley Eyton stepped in between the fireman and further punishment and decided in favor of Luther McCarty Tuesday.

Wytheville, Va., Dec. 13.—Sidna Allen, leader of the Hillsville gunmen who shot up the Carroll county court and killed five persons, was convicted of involuntary manslaughter Wednesday. The jury fixed his punishment at five years' imprisonment.

Chicago, Dec. 11.—Explosion of the powder house in the stone quarry of the A. C. O'Loughlin company in Bellwood shattered windows and shook buildings for a radius of 12 miles shortly after noon Monday. No one was seriously hurt.

Sandy Hook, N. J., Dec. 11.—A new 14-inch gun burst while being tested at the Sandy Hook proving grounds Monday. The muzzle of the gun was blown a hundred yards. The temporary carriage of the gun was shattered.

PRINCE OF BAVARIA IS DEAD

Luitpold Succumbs in Munich, Following Several Months of Failing Health—Mode of Life Simple.

Munich, Bavaria, Dec. 14.—Luitpold, prince regent of Bavaria, died here Thursday. He was ninety-one years old. The prince regent had been in failing health several months and his death was not unexpected. Luitpold was sixty-five years old and had lived a long and useful life as a great German military leader when he was called upon in 1886 to take the throne of Bavaria, the second largest state in the German empire. His call to the regency was the result of the insanity of King Ludwig II. and his brother, King Otto. Like his friend, the emperor Francis Joseph, Luitpold cared not a fig for the frumperies of his high position. His mode of life was simple. He rarely, even in his later years, departed from his habits of rising before sun up.

MEMPHIS POLICE KILL THIEF

Officers Take Train Robbers After Slaying One in a Fierce Fusillade of Bullets.

Memphis, Tenn., Dec. 12.—Kinney Bergman, train bandit and cracksman, was killed and three other bandits who have terrorized the trainmen and robbed banks and post offices throughout the southwest in the last two years, were captured here in a raid by detectives in a lonely hut in the south part of the city.

London, Dec. 10.—An unconfirmed report is current in London that the St. Patrick installation regalia, which was stolen from historic Dublin castle in July 1907, has suddenly and mysteriously been replaced.

Naval Officer Accidently Killed.

New York, Dec. 11.—Richard H. Towsley, a retired naval officer and at one time state comptroller of Nebraska, accidentally shot and killed himself Monday in cleaning a gun preparatory to a hunting trip.

HE KNEW WHAT TO AVOID

If Knowing Human Nature Would Do It This Man Would Have Made Good Preacher.

"Dr. John Haynes Holmes, who preached a Bull Moose sermon to President Taft the Sunday before election day, isn't like Washington White," said a member of Dr. Holmes' Church of the Messiah in New York.

"Washington White was an aged hod carrier. Laying down his paper one evening, he said to his wife over his spectacles:

"'Martha, I believe I'd make a preacher. Listen, now, and I'll give you a sermon.'

"The old man then stood up to the table and hollowed out a vigorous discourse on the wickedness of the idolators of the Orient.

"His wife said at the end:

"'A good enough sermon, Washington, but you've told us all about the sins of the foreigners and never a word about the sins of the folks at home here.'

"'Ha, he, ha, I understand preachin' too well for that,' laughed the wily old man."

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Annie Gattle, a fellow-passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers. Mrs. Wellington hears Little Jimmie's voice. Later she meets Mrs. Whitcomb. Mallory reports to Marjorie his failure to find a preacher. They decide to pretend a quarrel and Mallory finds a vacant berth. Mrs. Jimmie discovers Wellington on the train. Mallory again makes an unsuccessful hunt for a preacher. Dr. Temple poses as a physician. Mrs. Temple is induced by Mrs. Wellington to smoke a cigar. Sight of preacher on a station platform raises Mallory's hopes, but he takes another train. Missing hand baggage compels the couple to borrow from passengers. Jimmie gets a cinder in his eye and Mrs. Jimmie gives first aid. Coolness is then resumed. Still no clergyman. More borrowing. Dr. Temple puzzled by behavior of different couples. Marjorie's jealousy aroused by Mallory's baseball jargon. Marjorie suggests wrecking the train in hopes that accident will produce a preacher. Also tries to induce conductor to hold the train so she can shop. Marjorie's dog is missing. She pulls the cord, stopping the train. Conductor restores dog and lovers quarrel. Lathrop wires for a preacher to marry him and Miss Gattle. Mallory tells Lathrop of his predicament and arranges to borrow the preacher. Kitty Lewellyn, former sweetheart of Mallory's, appears and arouses Marjorie's jealousy. Preacher boards train. After marrying Lathrop and Miss Gattle the preacher escapes Mallory by leaping from moving train. Mallory's dejection moves Marjorie to reconciliation. The last day on the train brings Mallory the fear of missing his transport. Mallory gets a Nevada marriage license. Marjorie refuses to be married by a divorce drummer. Mr. and Mrs. Jimmie make up. Kitty Lewellyn refuses to return Mallory's bracelet. Robbers hold up the train.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—Continued.

Marjorie was trying at the same time to compel Mallory to crawl under a seat and to find a place to hide Snoozleums, whom she was warning not to say a word. Snoozleums, understanding only that his mistress was in some distress, refused to stay in his basket and kept offering his services and his attentions.

Suddenly Marjorie realized that Kathleen was trying to faint in Mallory's arms, and forgot everything else in a determined effort to prevent her.

After the first blood-sweat of abject fright had begun to cool, the passengers came to realize that the invaders were not after lives, but loot. Then came a panic of miserly effort to conceal treasure.

Kathleen, finding herself banished from Mallory's protection, ran to Mrs. Whitcomb, who had given Ashton up as a hopeless task.

"What shall we do, oh, what, oh what shall we do, dear Mrs. Wellington?" she cried.

"Don't you dare call me Mrs. Wellington!" Mrs. Whitcomb screamed; then she began to flutter. "But we'd better hide what we can. I hope the rah-rah-robbers are ge-gentlemen."

She pushed a diamond locket containing a small portrait of Sammy into her back hair, leaving part of the chain dangling. Then she tried to stuff a large handbag into her stocking.

Mrs. Fosdick found her husband at last, for he made a wild dash to her side, embraced her, called her his wife and defied all the powers of Nevada to tear them apart. He had a brilliant idea. In order to save his fat wallet from capture, he tossed it through an open window. It fell at the feet of one of the robbers as he ran along the side of the car, shooting at such heads as were put out of windows. He picked it up and dropped it into the feed-bag he had swung at his side. Then running on, he clambered over the brass rail of the observation platform and entered the rear of the train, as his confederate, driving the conductor ahead of him, forged his way aft from the front, while a third masquerader aligned the engineer, the fireman, the brakeman and the baggagemen.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Hands Up!

All this time Lieutenant Mallory had been thinking as hard as an officer in an ambuscade. His harrowing experiences and incessant defeats the past days had unnerved him and shattered his self-confidence. He was not afraid, but intensely disgusted. He sat absent-mindedly patting Marjorie on the back and repeating:

"Don't worry, honey; they're not going to hurt anybody. They don't want anything but our money. Don't worry, I won't let 'em hurt you."

But he could not shake off a sense of nausea. He felt himself a representative of the military prowess of the country, and here he was as helpless as a man on parole.

The fact that Mallory was a soldier occurred to a number of the passengers simultaneously. They had been trained by early studies in those beautiful works of fiction, the school histories of the United States, and by many Fourths of July, to believe that the American soldier is an invincible being, who has never been defeated and never known fear.

They surged up to Mallory in a wave of hope. Dr. Temple, being nearest, spoke first. Having learned by experience that his own prayers were not always answered as he wished, he had an impulse to try some weapon he had never used.

"Young man," he pleaded across the back of a seat, "will you kindly lend me a gun?"

Mallory answered sullenly: "Mine is in my trunk on the train ahead, damn it. If I had it I'd have a lot of fun."

Mrs. Whitcomb had an inspiration. She ran to her berth, and came back with a tiny silver-plated revolver.

"I'll lend you this. Sammy gave it to me to protect myself in Nevada!"

Mallory smiled at the .22-caliber toy, broke it open, and displayed an empty cylinder.

"Where are the pills that go with it?" he said.

"Oh, Sammy wouldn't let me have any bullets. He was afraid I'd hurt myself."

Mallory returned it, with a bow. "It would make an excellent nut-cracker."

"Aren't you going to use it?" Mrs. Whitcomb gasped.

"It's empty," Mallory explained.

"But the robbers don't know that! Couldn't you just overawe them with it?"

"Not with that," said Mallory, "unless they died laughing."

Mrs. Wellington pushed forward: "Then what the devil are you going to do when they come?"

Mallory answered meekly: "If they request it, I shall hold up my hands."

"And you won't resist?" Kathleen gasped.

"Not a resist."

"And he calls himself a soldier!" she sneered.

Mallory writhed, but all he said was: "A soldier doesn't have to be a jackass. I know just enough about guns not to monkey with the wrong end of 'em."

"Coward!" she flung at him. He turned white, but Marjorie red, and made a leap at her, crying: "He's the bravest man in the world. You say a word, and I'll scratch your eyes out."

This reassured Mallory a little, and he laughed nervously, as he restrained her. Kathleen retreated out of danger, with a parting shot: "Our engagement is off."

"Thanks," Mallory said, and put out his hand: "Will you return the bracelet?"

"I never return such things," said Kathleen.

The scene was so painful and such an anachronism that Dr. Temple tried to resume a more pressing subject: "It's your opinion then that we'd best surrender?"

"Of course—since we can't run."

Wedgewood broke in impatiently: "Well, I consider it a dastardly outrage. I'll not submit to it. I'm a subject of His Majesty the—"

"You're a subject of His Majesty the Man Behind the Gun," said Mallory.

"I shall protest, none the less," Wedgewood insisted.

Mallory grinned a little. "Have you any last message to send home to your mother?"

Wedgewood was a trifle chilled at this. "D-don't talk of such things," he said.

And by this time the train-robbers had hastily worked their way through the other passengers, and reached the frantic inhabitants of the sleeper, "Snowdrop."

"Hands up! Higher!! Hands up!"

With a true sense of the dramatic, the robbers sent ahead of them the most hair-raising yells. They arrived simultaneously at each end of the aisle, and with a few short sharp commands, straightened the disorderly rabble into a beautiful line, with all palms aloft and all eyes wide and wild.

One robber drove ahead of him the conductor and the other drove in Mr. Manning, whom he had found trying to crawl between the shelves of the linen-closet.

The marauders were apparently cattlemen, from their general get-up. Their hats were pulled low, and just beneath their eyes they had drawn big black silk handkerchiefs, tied behind the ears and hanging to the breast.

Over their shoulders they had slung the feed-bags of their horses, to serve as receptacles for their swag. Their shirts were chalky with alkali dust. Their legs were encased in heavy chaparejos, and they carried each a pair of well-used Colt's revolvers that looked as big as artillery.

When the passengers had shoved and jostled into line, one of the men jabbed the conductor in the back with the muzzle of his gun, and snarled: "Now speak your little piece, like I learned it to you."

The conductor, like an awkward schoolboy, grinned sheepishly, and spoke, his hands in the air the while: "Ladies and gents, these here parties in the black tidies says they want everybody to hold his or her hands as high as possible till you git permission to lower 'em; they advise you not to resist, because they hate the sight of blood, but prefer it to argument."

The impatient robbers, themselves the prey of fearful anxieties, broke in, barking like a pair of coyotes in a jumble of commands: "Now, line up with your backs that way, and no back talk. These guns shoot awful easy. And remember, as each party is finished with, they are to turn round and keep their hands up, on penalty of gittin' 'em shot off. Line up! Hands up! Give over there!"

Mrs. Jimmie Wellington took her time about moving into position, and her deliberation brought a howl of wrath from the robber: "Get into that line, you!"

Mrs. Wellington whirled on him: "How dare you, you brute?" And she turned up her nose at the gun.

The anxious conductor intervened: "Better obey, madame; he's an ugly lad."

"I don't mind being robbed," said Mrs. Jimmie, "but I won't endure rudeness."

The robber shook his head in despair, and he tried to wither her with sarcasm: "Pardong, mamselly, would you be so kind and condescendin' as to step into that there car before I blow your husband's gol-hiama head off."

This brought her to terms. She hastened to her place, but put out a restraining hand on Jimmie, who needed no restraint. "Certainly, to save my dear husband. Don't strike him, Jimmie!"

Then each man stuck one revolver into its convenient holster, and, covering the passengers with the other, proceeded to frisk away valuables with a speed and agility that would have looked prettier if those impatient-looking muzzles had not pointed here, there and everywhere with such venomous threats.

And so they worked from each end of the car toward the middle. Their hands ran swiftly over bodies with a loathsome familiarity that could only be resented, not revenged. Their hands dived into pockets, and up sleeves, and into women's hair, everywhere that a jewel or a bill might be secreted. And always a rough growl or a swing of the revolver silenced any protest.

Their heinous fingers had hardly begun to ply, when the solemn stillness was broken by a chuckle and low hoot of laughter, a darkey's unctuous laughter. At such a place it was more shocking than at a funeral.

"What ails you?" was the nearest robber's demand.

The porter tried to wipe his streaming eyes without lowering his hands, as he chuckled on: "I—I—just thought of sumpum funny."

"Funny!" was the universal groan.

"I was just thinking," the porter snickered, "what mighty poor pickings you-all are goin' to git out of me. Whilst if you had 'a' waited till I got to 'Frisco, I'd jest naturally been oozin' money."

The robber relieved him of a few dimes and quarters and ordered him to turn round, but the black face whirled back as he heard from the other end of the car Wedgewood's indignant complaint: "I say, this is an outrage!"

"Ah, close your trap and turn round, or I'll—"

The porter's smile died away. "Good Lawd," he sighed, "they're goin' to skin that British lion! And I just wore myself out on him."

The far-reaching effect of the whole procedure was just beginning to dawn on the porter. This little run on the bank meant a period of financial stringency for him. He watched the hurrying heads a moment or two, then his wrath rose to terrible proportions:

"Look here, man," he shouted at the robber, "ain't you-all goin' to leave these passengers nothin' a tall?"

"Not on purpose, nigger."

"No small change, or nothin'?"

"Nary a red."

"Then, passengers," the porter proclaimed, while the robber watched him in amazement; "then, passengers, I want to give you-all fair warnin' heah and now: No tips, no whisk-broom!"

Perhaps because their hearts were already overflowing with distress, the passengers endured this appalling threat without comment, and when there was a commotion at the other end of the line, all eyes rolled that way.

Plan to Make Rome Seaport.

The latest project to make Rome a seaport is to lay out a port 85 feet deep near Castel Fusaro, formed by running two jetties out into the sea for some distance, as at the port of Ymuiden, Holland. From the port will lead a ship canal 15 miles long and 200 feet wide and 27 feet deep. At Rome shipping accommodations will be laid out in the river below the city, and this will be connected with the navigable part of the Tiber by a system of locks. It will cost about $15,000,000 to carry out the project. Opponents of the idea claim it will not pay, but the promoters affirm that when once the city is connected with the Mediterranean there will result a great amount of traffic.

Embarrassed Judge.

It would be unkind to give the name of an eminent Massachusetts judge who beckoned an officer in the court to him the other day to inquire the name of a certain man sitting in the courtroom. The judge felt that he knew him very intimately—and perhaps ought to extend to him some special courtesies—but, not recalling his name, could not decide what to do.

The officer of the court returned in a few moments with the report that the gentleman was a bartender at Young's.—Boston Herald.

PARKER IN PRISON

EMBEZZLER BEGINS SERVING HIS SENTENCE AT STILLWATER.

SHARP SAYS NOT GUILTY.

Attorneys for Winnebago Bank Head Say There Is Not Enough Evidence for Trial.

Blue Earth.—After a week spent here in the county jail, during which time Harry W. Parker had been indicted, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to state prison for the embezzlement of $12,000, he walked with Sheriff George Freer to the union depot, a distance of nearly a mile, took the train to Stillwater, and commenced his sentence.

John Sharp, president of the institution, was arraigned in the court charged with making false statements as to the correct status of the State Bank of Commerce on Feb. 20 and pleaded not guilty. He is represented by Attorneys Dunn and Carlson of Albert Lea and W. H. Hodgman of Winnebago. Attorney Carlson filed a demurrer in the case and at some length argued that there was not sufficient grounds for the case going to trial.

The state's case against Sharp will be handled by County Attorney H. L. Bullis and Assistant Attorney General Janes of St. Paul. Mr. Janes answered the argument to the demurrer.

AN EIGHTY-MILE WIND.

Six Large Superior Steamers Battle for Hours to Gain Shelter of Bay.

Duluth, Dec. 12. — An eighty-mile gale that swept Lake Superior compelled six large steamers to seek protection in Petitrice Bay. The boats are:

North Star, loaded with merchandise; Upson, Yale, Sultana, Wilbert L. Smith, and W. P. Snyder, coal laden. A wireless message was received from the ships stating that the entire fleet had made the harbor safely, and will lay there until the wind abates.

Petitrice Bay was reached after battling with the waves for three hours. The six vessels are a part of a fleet of 11 ships which has been at Whitefish Point since Saturday. The other five are still at Whitefish.

The wind began blowing from the Northeast during the afternoon and gradually gained velocity until it was estimated that it was blowing 80 miles an hour.

IMPERILED FLEET SAFE.

Thirteen Vessels Brave Northwest Wind to Reach Port.

Duluth.—The imperiled coal fleet that put into Bay de Grisa during Monday night's storm arrived in Duluth harbor during the night. A northwest gale had Lake Superior in its grip Wednesday night, accompanied by snow, but Thursday morning the wind died down. The boats had expected to put out Wednesday afternoon or evening, but on account of a shift in the wind they couldn't.

Some of the fleet of 13 are: Mendota, Alva, Castalia, North Star, Upson, Yale, Sultana, W. L. Smith and W. P. Snyder. Several other ships still are under Whitefish. When these arrive the season will be ended.

Answers Phone, Drops Dead.

Rochester.—When Mrs. A. M. Rowley and Miss Edith Bradshaw went to call upon their sister, Mrs. George Rowley, they found the young woman dead with her 19-month-old baby playing near her. Only a few moments before one of the sisters had telephoned Mrs. Rowley and she had responded apparently in her usual good health. Mrs. Rowley had completed her weekly washing and when last seen showed no signs of ill health.

Victim of Marshal's Gun.

Spooner.—John Harvey, of Pitt, Minn., died in the Spooner hospital from two shots fired into his abdomen by Marshal A. H. Fryberg, of Spooner. The shooting took place in front of the village auditorium. Harvey leaves a widow and four children. Marshal Fryberg is under arrest. Marshal Fryberg had been instructed to take a billy and a gun from and arrest Frank Taylor and mistook Harvey for the alleged "bad man."

Theimer Elected City Treasurer.

Owatonna.—Karl P. Theimer has been elected city treasurer to fill the unexpired term of Michael Leary, who died of paralysis. Theimer resigned as city assessor to accept the treasurership. The election of an assessor has been postponed until the next meeting of the council.

Viskitj Convicted.

Hastings.—The jury, after being out only two hours, found Ivan Viskitj guilty of murder in the first degree for shooting Mrs. Anna Blaeich at South St. Paul on Oct. 3. He was sentenced to state's prison for life by Judge William Hodgson.

Accidentally Killed By Son.

Owatonna.—A. B. Horton, a farmer of the township of Richland, is dead as the result of the accidental explosion of a gun in the hands of his son.

HENRY RINES.

The fight for speaker of the Minnesota Legislature has just been ended with the election of Henry Rines, of Mora, for the position. Mr. Rines has pledged the support of 68 of the 120 members and all rivals for speakership have withdrawn. He is a newspaper editor.

BUTTERMAKERS RALLY.

Southern Minnesota Points Well Represented at State Convention.

Wadena.—Wadena is in gala attire in honor of the butter and cheese makers who are arriving in large numbers to attend the nineteenth annual convention of the state association. The attendance was satisfactory, it being one of the largest conventions in the history of the association.

A special train of five sleepers from the Twin Cities, bearing seventy delegates, largely from southern Minnesota points, arrived early over the Great Northern. The delegates spent the forenoon renewing acquaintances.

The convention opened at 2 p. m. in Burch's hall, one of the best auditoriums in central Minnesota. Dr. J. J. McKinnon, of Wadena, delivered the address of welcome and the response was by J. F. Farrell, of Carver. After the annual address by President J. T. Pomroy, of Mapleton, Secretary M. Sorenson, of Pelican Rapids, and Treasurer J. J. Roch, of Pine Island, submitted their reports.

The opening session included a report of the Dairy Record Publishing Company by M. P. Mortenson, of Albert Lea. O. A. Storvick, of St. Paul, spoke on "The Value of Educational Scoring Contests." The feature of the session was an address by B. H. Rawl, chief of the dairy division, bureau of animal industry, Washington, D. C.

ONE DEAD; THREE HURT

Conductor, Caught in Car, Burns to Death—Caboose Hit By Freight.

St. Paul. — One man was killed and three injured, while several had narrow escapes in two train wrecks here, one in the St. Paul yards and the other in the Midway district.

Albert E. Patnode, freight conductor on the Great Northern railroad, was burned to death in his caboose at Lexington avenue, when it was struck from the rear by the engine of an incoming freight and demolished.

Carol Lansing, Willmar, Minn., brakeman on the freight, who was with Patnode in the caboose, was thrown through a huge opening which was split in the side of the car and landed on his feet, only slightly injured. The engine crews of both locomotives jumped and were unhurt.

Ed Meary, 899 Park avenue, a Great Northern switchman, and R. E. White, 221 Pennsylvania avenue, a Great Northern engineer, were painfully injured and damage estimated at $10,000 was done when a head-on collision occurred between a Great Western freight train and a Great Northern freight train in the St. Paul yards.

$200,000 ST. PAUL FIRE.

Heart of Business District Threatened in Disastrous Blaze.

St. Paul.—The very heart of the business center of St. Paul was threatened by a fire in McArthur's department store which resulted in a loss estimated at $200,000 on the building and contents.

The store is peculiarly arranged. It has a frontage of 150 feet on Seventh street by 100 feet deep and turns in an arcade angle toward Minnesota street, where there is a 50-foot frontage. This arrangement made the work of confining the fire to the store a difficult problem.

The only accident that occurred was to Fire Captain Jack Flennigon, brother of Acting Chief of Police Martin Flannigan, who sprained his right wrist soon after the fire apparatus arrived.

Tax Case May Go to Court.

St. Cloud.—The right of the city to collect taxes on railroad property leased for private purposes will probably be tried in the courts if the Great Northern refuses to pay its taxes on lots in this city used by coal and wood dealers. The company has so far refused to settle. Mayor Seberger has prepared and will have introduced in the next legislature a bill providing that a portion of the gross earnings tax be paid to the cities in the state where railroad property adjoins special municipal improvements.

WHITE PLAGUE FIGHT.

Association of Commerce May Aid in Procuring Legislation on the Subject.

St. Paul.—The plan mapped out by the committee appointed a year ago by Governor Eberhart to draft anti-tuberculosis legislation will be the program probably supported by the Association of Commerce in its efforts to obtain advanced legislation on this subject.

The committee's report already has gone to Governor Eberhart, but was not announced until this week, when Dr. H. Longstreet Taylor, a member of the committee, divulged the substance of the report. Dr. Taylor also is chairman of the public health committee of the Association of Commerce and secretary of the state anti-tuberculosis association. The three organizations propose to work hand in hand, Dr. Taylor says, to obtain anti-tuberculosis legislation.

The program mapped out by the governor's tuberculosis legislative committee, which probably will be pushed by the Association of Commerce and anti-tuberculosis association, has in mind the following projects:

First—The establishment of county tuberculosis hospitals for advanced cases of tuberculosis, with competent physicians in charge; financial aid from the state desired.

Second — Completion of the state sanatorium at Walker, with appropriation of $150,000 for the work.

Third—Establishment of a tuberculosis commission to supervise all tuberculosis sanatorium work; levy of .4 of a mill annually, which would mean about $400,000, for four consecutive years.

Bills covering these features are included in the legislative committee's report to the governor.

In asking for $150,000 for the immediate completion of the state sanatorium at Walker, Dr. Taylor says sixty more patients can be accommodated there when servants' quarters and a dining room and kitchen are constructed. The $400,000 annually for the tuberculosis commission, Dr. Taylor says, would be used in providing hospital care for tubercular patients.

INNOCENT; IS SLAIN.

Spooner, Minn., Resident, Taken for Alleged Desperado, Is Killed.

Spooner.—John Harvey of Pitt, Minnesota, died in the Spooner hospital from two shot wounds inflicted by Marshal A. H. Fryberg of Spooner. The shooting took place in front of the village auditorium Tuesday night. The deceased leaves a widow with four children. Marshal Fryberg is under arrest.

Marshal Fryberg had been instructed by Mayor E. W. Koefed of Spooner to take a billy and a gun from, and arrest Frank Taylor, an alleged bad man. Koefed went with Fryberg through the different saloons and Taylor was located. The marshal was outside on the lookout. When he saw the supposed Taylor come out, the marshal is said to have cried "You are under arrest," and fired the first shot. The supposed Taylor was John Harvey. Harvey walked off until the second shot was fired, when he fell. The marshal said it was the first time he had used his new automatic gun and that he had fired as a bluff.

WOOS WITH REVOLVER.

James Secklin Lands in Jail Because of Too Insistent Ardor.

Minneapolis. — When Miss Margaret Leek looked down the barrel of a blue revolver after she had been threatened with death unless she married the suitor who held the gun, her wits worked double time to find a way to escape him.

"Wait until I go into the back room and get my coat," she said. She went through the back room of the store where she was working, 215 Seventh street south, and into the back door of the next store. She telephoned to police headquarters and Detective John Morrissey went to the place on the run.

All Go to Willmar.

Morris.—All the Commercial clubs in this part of the state sent delegates to the Willmar meeting of the West Central Development association on Friday and Saturday. Morris sent a large delegation to represent its club and a goodly number of farmers to represent the Stevens County Farm club. These two bodies were labeled as the "Stevens County Starters," for it was in Stevens county that the idea for the association was conceived and the preliminary steps taken for its organization. Halloway, the liveliest little town in the state, also had its club there in a body with the banner bearing its motto "Halloway Hustlers." Danson, Herman, Wheaton, Graceville, Ortonville, Clinton, Montevideo and a dozen other towns had official delegates, while every township in Kandiyohi county sent at least two representatives.

Select Trio to Lobby.

St. Paul.—Northern Minnesota reapportionment advocates will keep a trio of men familiar with politics in St. Paul during a part of the coming legislative session to work for the passage of a reapportionment bill. They are: E. C. Kiley, of Grand Rapids, editor of the Herald-Review and a Democratic candidate for the legislature at the last election; F. J. McPartlin, International Falls attorney, and A. H. Vernon, of Little Falls, former chief clerk of the house. Their expenses will be paid.

Winter is with us, but owing to the fine weather it is hard to realize that fall is passed and it is winter.

The legislature convenes the first of next month which will keep the corporations busy for three or four moths seeing to it that no laws are passed against OUR interests.

Apples are now worth about $2,00 a bushel to the consumer as against 20 cts for the producer. Wait until president Wilson solves the problem of what makes the high cost of living.

Theif River Falls people are doing a lot of pushing for that railroad that they are going to build east of the city to tap the grain producing country east of them. There will be some stock taken in the line by the farmers of the eastern part of the county.

The McIntosh Times says that the people dont want county division. They used to but their last campaign was run on the principal of putting a race horse into a race without warming him up. If McIntosh had had a newspaper that would have placed the facts before the people as they were, six months before election the result would have been different.

There is one law on our statute books that needs fixing, and that is our drainage law. The way it is now, it is easy to take a contract to dig a ditch, then go as you please, by getting a bonding Co. to back you, for there is two laws, so they can slip in between them, but the matter will be tested in the courts to find out where the weak points for the farmers and tax payers are, and have them repaired this winter.

Night Jobs For the Jeweler.

Under the jeweler's letter box and door bell was a second bell labeled "Jeweler's night bell." "Kindly explain," said the visitor. "Is the craving for diamonds and wedding rings so insatiable that you have to get up at night to meet the demand?"

"It is not the prospect of making a sale that gets me out of bed after midnight," said the jeweler, "but the misfortunes of my fellow men. About the only people who ring me up after working hours are those who have a piece of jewelry on that they can't get off and don't dare to wear until morning for fear of blood poisoning. These accidents happen often. Every doctor in town knows I can be routed out in an emergency case, so all rings that must be filed off swollen fingers, all earrings that must be removed from inflamed ears, all necklaces and bracelets that must be taken from bruised necks and wrists without delay are brought to me."—New York Press.

WEDDING STORIES

Experiences Grave and Gay at the Marriage Ceremony.

ODD BREAKS AND BLUNDERS.

The Tearful Regret That Flowed From the Heart of a Happy Ex-Widow—A Pert Reply to "Wilt Thou?"—A Tragic Wait and Its Sequel.

According to the stories told by several of Chicago's leading clergymen, wedding ceremonies do not always run any smoother than true love.

"People seem to act more insanely at a wedding than at any other time, save perhaps a fire," declared one pastor, "and it is usually the bridegroom who gets the most flustered. It is seldom that a woman gets the responses mixed as does the man. One time at a fashionable wedding where I was officiating the bridegroom insisted upon saying in a loud and distinct voice, much to the amusement of his hearers, 'I take me this plight' instead of the usual 'I plight thee my troth.'

"Another time when I was marrying a country couple at my home I asked the bridegroom the usual question, 'Wilt thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife?' and he replied, with fire in his eye, 'What do you suppose we're here for ef I wouldn't?'

"It was at a wedding in my church that the six-year-old niece of the bridegroom caused a ripple of laughter. With big eyes she watched the bridal procession come up the aisle, and as it neared the altar she noticed her uncle, who had come out of the vestry and with his best man and me awaited the bride in the chancel. Up she jumped and, pointing a small finger at the bridegroom, said in her shrill baby voice, 'Oh, mother, if there isn't Uncle Bob with his best clothes on and his everyday nose!' She had been told by her uncle, who possessed an unusually prominent nose, that when he got married it would be shorter.

"One time after reading a ceremony the bridegroom handed me a five dollar bill, saying, 'I'll give you two.' Not understanding him, I said, 'Thank you,' and put it into my pocket. He touched me on the shoulder and again said, 'I'll give you two.' 'Oh, you want change?' I inquired. He nodded, and I handed him $3."

One laughable wedding was that of a widow who married one of her boarders. She was a woman past forty-five, with all the airs of a schoolgirl, and amused all who knew her by her references on all occasions to her departed husband, John. In fact, John got to be a byword among all who knew the widow. Among the boarders was a young fellow of twenty-five, who fell in love with the fair relict of the sainted John, and in a short time the roomers were all invited to attend a wedding to be held in the parlor.

The widow was large, tall and stout and the bridegroom exceedingly small for a man, and when on the night of the wedding the widow appeared at the proper moment leading her prospective husband into the parlor, much as a mother leads her little boy, even the waiting clergyman had to suppress a smile. After the ceremony had been read and congratulatory speeches were in order the erstwhile widow exclaimed, with emotion, "Oh, if only my poor, dear John were here to see how happy I am at this moment!" Only the perfect self control of the guests saved the situation.

It was in an Episcopal church that a superstitious bride fainted at the altar. Just as the bridegroom was about to put the ring on her finger his nervous, shaking fingers dropped it, and it rolled away across the floor. The bride, certain that some great calamity would overtake them, refused to go on with the services and then fainted. After the delay of an hour or so she was prevailed upon to allow the ceremony to be finished.

A Unitarian minister tells this story: "One time I was to read the service in my church in a western state where licenses are not required. The church was filled, and the bridal party arrived on time, all save the bridegroom. For more than an hour we waited, the bride growing almost hysterical and the guests restless over a delay the reason for which was not suspected.

"At last word was brought that the party was ready, and I came out from the vestry, the organ pealed forth the wedding march, and the bride came up the aisle to the altar, pale and trembling, looking much different from the pretty, flushed girl I knew.

"Imagine my surprise when the bride and best man stepped before me. The man said a few whispered words. I looked at the girl, and she nodded, and I began the service that made the girl the wife of the best man. The bride was saved from mortification, and the guests were not disappointed.

"It seems the best man had been in love with the girl, and when the bridegroom did not come he quietly stepped in and got her consent to marry him. [illegible] never heard directly from the recreant bridegroom, and her marriage to the best man proved a happy one."—Chicago News.

Animals Under Water.

The ability of a beaver to remain under water for a long time is not really so tough a problem as it looks. When the lake or pond is frozen over a beaver will come to the under surface of the ice and expel his breath so that it will form a wide, flat bubble. The air, coming in contact with the ice and water, is purified, and the beaver breathes it again. This operation he can repeat several times. The otter and muskrat do the same thing.

We have a fine farm for sale in Deer Park township for only $21 per acre.

Even J. Sund is up this week visiting friends and looking after his realestate interest.

Two men from Theif River Falls was up looking at the dredge on ditch 47 Sunday, and may buy it.

Have you tried any of that Christmas popcorn at Vaughan Bros & Co it is fine.

A.D.Brown of Neptune was transacting business at Highlanding Monday.

There has not been any temporary bridges put in on ditch 53 yet, which is very incovenent for the people that have to travel long distances to go a little ways.

Remember about putting them loose pennies in mail boxes to pay postage on, the mail carrier will leave both your letters and pennies for you to pick up yourself.

Lenard McAndress left for St. Hilaire yesterday for a few days visit with his uncle Mike McAndress and family.

The weather has been rather unfavorable for hauling out grain this week, as there is to much snow for wheeling and not quite enough for sleighing.

Vaughan Bros. and Co. have a fine display of Christmas goods on hand this year. Call and see them before purchasing elsewhere.

The Red Lake River Transportation Co. Will have their regular annual meeting on schedule time in January for the purpose of adjusting the books.

Frank Marsh, who rented the S.L.Holm farm has moved in, and is busy fixing up for the winter and preparing for the springs work.

We extend thanks to a number of our Subscribers for cash Subscription paid the past week and would be pleased to extend the same courtesy to a large number of others, who's subscription is long past due.

It must be a source of satisfaction to the engineer to accept the class of ditching work done on ditch 53, as it certainly fills the bill.

Mr. John Sigmond, Robert Hudson, Sigurd Sigurdson, Miss Emma and Julia Sigurdson and W.G. Hunt and family from Highlanding took in the basket social at Wm. Swanson, on last Saturday evening.

Thomas Jacobson has four fine working oxen for sale, as he will rent his farm next year. Call and see him if you need any second hand machinery.

Oscar Lufthus, and August Lillo furnished the music for the basket party at Mr. Swanson last Saturday evening, assisted by the Misses Florences, on the organ which was first class.

Santa Claus headquarters is at Vaughan Bros. and Co. this year.

The ladies sewing society of Mayfield will hold their Christmas Auction Sale at the Malone school house on Friday December 27th, commencing at 10 o'clock a.m. Free dinner at noon. All are invited.

The dredges on ditch 53 completed the main ditch on Monday, and the dredges are now laid up for the winter. The work has been done in first class style, and the contractors can have the satisfaction of knowing that their work is highly satisfactory to the farmers, who petitioned for the ditch because they wanted it. There is two small branches to be finished in the spring and the grading to do.

Some of the contractors that have been doing work on ditch 47 had ought to go over and take a look at the fine work done on ditch 53, they got tall the people pranks because they kick about that botched up work on 47.

A FINE ENTERTAINMENT.

The basket social given at the residence of Wm. Swanson, in Deer Park township last Saturday evening was largely attended, and a most enjoyable evenings entertainment was given. The sale of the baskets netted the neat little sum of $66 for the benefit of Mrs. C. Waldon, who has just underwent an operation at Crookston.

Misses Julia and Clara Florence, from Neptune, sang some fine songs that brought them many an incore, for just one more.

Mr. Swanson used his best endeavors to make the large crowd present feel at home, and he may be sure that all present fully appreciated his hospitality.

We will throw our searchlight down all rat holes without fear or favor, and will have some very pertinent things to say on proposed legislation which a corporation owned newspaper could not bring before the public. We have at hand some very interesting facts gathered during the General Election, which will be interesting in connection with several proposed bills which are now drawn up ready to be brought before the Legislature. We will give you some red hot sizzling news that you will not find in any other newspaper. Among other things the evil arising from the entrance of the pulpit into politics, and its effect on the incoming Legislature.

GREAT AUK'S EGG?

Maybe, but Nevertheless, It Arrived at the Breakfast Table in a Scramble.

By MARGARET MANNING.

Professor Ferdinand Brinckhofen wandered into the kitchen of his summer bungalow, on the Maine shore. His wife was washing the dinner dishes.

"Ellen, my dear," he said, "Doctor Cavendish, of the Natural History museum, will be here this afternoon. Can you get up a meal for him? He has to start back tomorrow morning."

"I suppose so, Ferdinand," answered his wife, a little tartly. "You know, of course, that we haven't much in the house to offer a guest. However, I'll do my best, and if he will be satisfied with it he's welcome. Why is he coming all this distance just to spend the night with us?"

Professor Brinckhofen put his arm round his wife's waist and kissed her.

"I know you're busy, Ellen," he said. "Next summer we'll get a maid." And he wandered out, while his wife went on washing. She dried the last plate and set it aside.

"I wonder just why Doctor Cavendish is coming here for one night," she said to herself.

Professor Brinckhofen engaged a rowboat and pulled round to the railroad terminal, where he arrived just in time to greet Doctor Cavendish as his visitor stepped out of his car.

"Well, what did you think of my letter?" he asked, after the customary greetings had been interchanged.

Doctor Cavendish took his friend by the arm. "My dear old enthusiast," he answered, "to be frank with you, I am sceptical—wholly sceptical. It sounds too good to be true. If you had told me that you had discovered a buried Indian village or a dozen asteroids I would have accepted your word without question. But a great auk's egg—no, my friend. You have probably mistaken the egg of a crested grebe or tufted puffin for that of the auk."

"Good Heaven, Brinckhofen, It is! It is!"

"But the great auk did range as far south as Maine in the last century!" cried the professor.

"And the last specimen was shot in 1844."

"No, Cavendish, in 1912. I tell you it was an auk. I shot the brooding bird, but it fell into the water and drifted out to sea before I could get a boat. But the egg—it was an auk's egg, and it was warm. I took it home and I'm incubating it."

"What does Mrs. Brinckhofen think of it?"

"She doesn't know anything about it, of course. I don't believe in telling my wife a professional secret. And the joke of it is"—he nudged Cavendish in the ribs—"it's incubating with a clutch of eggs that she set out last week under one of our hens. It couldn't be safer anywhere."

"Show me!" said Cavendish sceptically, and they entered the rowboat and, a few minutes later, rounded the point of land behind which the Brinckhofens had their bungalow.

"There was where I shot her," said the professor, pointing to the high, towering cliff. "I didn't mean to, either, but I was so excited that I couldn't bear to think of her getting away. Now, before we do anything else we'll go straight to the cinch."

They climbed the hill and entered the little garden of the bungalow. In one corner was the hen house, and, in the center, seated upon a clutch of eggs surrounded with straw, was a gray hen, which looked at them with malignant eyes and half opened her beak as though to protect her treasure.

"Shoo!" said Professor Brinckhofen, and the hen slowly rose and retired a few paces, where it crouched with flapping wings and an irate expression. Professor Brinckhofen plunged his hand into the cinch and drew out the precious egg. It was a little larger than that of a goose.

"Good heavens, Brinckhofen, it is! It is!" yelled Doctor Cavendish, and, carefully replacing it, he seized his friend round the waist, and the two graybeards executed a dance.

Mrs. Brinckhofen watched them out of the kitchen window.

"I suppose that is Doctor Cavendish," she said pityingly. "I wonder why they are dancing in the hen house."

She sat down and meditated upon the subject until the men came in. Then she welcomed Doctor Cavendish with smiles.

"Come, Cavendish, I want to show you my laboratory," said Brinckhofen, dragging his friend away as soon as he decently could. They went into the professor's little bare room and began discussing the great discovery.

"Of course it goes to the museum, Brinckhofen," said Cavendish. "It will be worth a thousand dollars to you."

"A thousand dollars!" exclaimed the professor. "You are joking, Cavendish. Why, the egg alone would bring that at auction."

"Yes, yes, I'm speaking about the egg," said Doctor Cavendish irritably. "What are you speaking about?"

"Why, the auk, of course. Don't you know that I put it there so that it would hatch? Why, we'll have a real live bird, Cavendish. I shall sell it to the Zoological society, and I'll patch up the egg after it has hatched out, and I'll let you have that for a thousand. And the bird will lay more eggs, and I'll get a thousand apiece for those too, and—"

"I say," interposed Cavendish, "remember it isn't hatched yet. If I were you I would tell Mrs. Brinckhofen about it."

"Tell Mrs. Brinckhofen! Why, she'd tell the neighbors and they'd steal it or do something to it! Never trust a woman. No, it is safest just where it is."

They argued with some lack of equanimity until dinner time, when Mrs. Brinckhofen ejected them into the dining room.

"Hum! I'm hungry as a bear," said Doctor Cavendish, pulling his napkin across knees. "What have we here? Scrambled eggs? Fine!"

"I don't know whether you like scrambled goose eggs," said Mrs. Brinckhofen. "They say they're very nice. I found one under our biddy—it must have been laid by one of Mr. Giles's geese, for it wasn't there last time I looked. So I thought that as we hadn't many eggs I'd try what it tasted like."

"Woman!" gasped the professor, springing to his feet, "do you mean to say you—you scrambled that egg?"

"Yes, dear," said Mrs. Brinckhofen sweetly.

HOT BREAKFAST MEANS MUCH

Success or Failure of the Day Depends to a Large Extent on First Meal.

When a singularly successful business man was asked the secret of getting on in the world, he modestly said his wife deserved most of the credit, as she always had a good breakfast ready for him every day in the year, served punctually and piping hot. He further said that poor food, especially in the morning, was responsible for many business failures, for the man who sets out on a cold morning with cold, indifferent food in his stomach is ill-prepared for the business battle. It takes time and planning, but it pays to serve good breakfasts. It means getting up early enough to insure against rushing about and fretting when things go wrong, but the wise woman counts it no sacrifice to send her husband off cheery and well fed. There are plenty of ways in which a woman without help may manage, and even if she keeps a maid she will find plenty to oversee and correct day after day. The women who rise early to get breakfast for their husbands unite in saying there are possibilities in the early morning hours realized later in the day. When other women are sleepily getting up, the thrifty housekeepers have their morning work done and are ready to get the children off to school. There would be fewer failures in school work if all children were sent to the school room well fed in the morning. If they were aroused in time to dress leisurely and eat a hearty breakfast there would be fewer cases of nervous prostration among teachers. A cup of hot cocoa, a poached egg, good toast and well-cooked cereal served to the entire family in the morning and eaten in a leisurely manner would rob hospitals of many patients and give doctors and surgeons extra vacations every year.

Theories About Rainfall.

While we in this country have been suffering for some years from a lack of rain, some parts of Europe appear, according to statistics, to be getting more rain every year.

Observations at the Observatory of Paris show that from 1804 to 1824 the average yearly rainfall was 502 millimeters (an inch is about 25 millimeters). In the next twenty years the average was 507; then from 1845 to 1872 there was an increase to 525; in the next twenty years it was 553, and in the last nineteen years the average has grown to 584 millimeters—about 23½ inches.

The commonest theory to account for this is that the smoke and dust rising from a large city favor the condensation of moisture. But this theory runs counter to the experience of London, the smokiest city of Europe, where no such increased rainfall is recorded.

And in some of the mountainous regions of France the increase has been as much as 73 per cent., as compared with thirty years ago.

Worse and More of It.

"Concord! Concord!" shouted the brakeman, as the train pulled into the station during a tremendous outburst of thunder and lightning.

The clever woman grasped her umbrella firmly.

"Not only conquered," she ejaculated, "but taken by storm!"—Youth's Companion.

LITTLE NICETIES FOR BABY

Manufacturers Constantly Engaged in Turning Out Pretty Articles That Find Ready Sale.

The fascinating little afghans for the baby's carriages are made of white handkerchief linen. First a strip of the material is cut into three-quarter wide by one and one-half yard long proportions, then a half yard of the length is turned back from what is to be the upper end of the spread.

This turnover is daintily embroidered in white and trimmed at either end with huge bows of pink or blue satin ribbon. The lower end is rather more closely hand-embroidered, and finally the entire afghan, including the folded over edge, is bordered with wide cluny, put on flatly.

One of the most substantial and effective afghans is made of macrame, of appearance similar to those of handkerchief linen. But instead of folding over the top of a yard and a half long strip of the macrame allover, the apparent turnback veils coarse unbleached nets, and to this is attached the under section, after which the macrame edging is sewed flatly upon the sides of the entire spread.

MACRAME HANDBAG IS LIKED

Especially With Evening Wear They Make a Most Charming Addition to the Toilette.

We have developed a new mania for macrame handbags, and for evening wear these represent a charming addition to the toilette. The foundation of the bag is carried out in ivory or colored poplin, or some other stout silk, the macrame lace completely covering the whole, and being finished with a deep fringe at the base. These bags are looked upon as fully worthy of the handsome gold and silver mounts which form part of the scheme. Many women, who are clever with their fingers and naturally fond of work of this kind, find it a very simple matter to evolve the bag themselves. Another type of bag which is popular is entirely covered with strass and beadwork, in rich and multi-colored designs, and this is also often the fruit of the girl's industry when emancipated from the routine of school work.

Bead Trimmings.

Many of the smartest evening gowns are trimmed with bead plaques. The beads are so closely set together that there is no space between them. They are wrought upon canvas in the old-fashioned mat and screen designs. These show baskets of flowers and birds unreal-looking in their strange coloring.

The peasant fashions are much in vogue, and the suspenders are decorated with beads and embroidery.

The most beautiful bead trimmings are those that represent the arabesque designs on black chiffon, crepe de chine, net or taffeta.

Among the smartest evening gowns are those showing heavily beaded tunics over a foundation of chiffon.

Good and Bad Furniture.

The line between good ornament and bad ornament is the line between beauty and ugliness.

The only good furniture is that which is both beautiful and useful.

All furniture that lacks either beauty or usefulness is bad furniture.

Furniture that is well constructed, of good shape, and excellent finish, is good furniture no matter how elaborately it may be decorated.

Furniture of bad shape or bad finish, is bad furniture no matter how free from meretricious mounts and carvings.—George Leland Hunter in Country Life in America.

Novel Shoe Case.

A woman who is hard on her silk stockings has learned to utilize the tops for bags for her shoes and slippers. When the runs and holes get undarnable the tops of the stockings are cut off midway of the leg and the lower edge sewed across in a French seam.

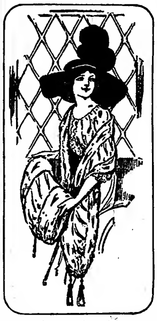
A shoe is kept in each of these stocking bags, which take up no room, cost nothing and act as an absorber of dust. Sometimes the kind of shoes is outlined on the hem to make them more easily distinguishable.

NEW COSTUME FOR TEA COSY

Though Simple, It May Be Made Very Pretty, and is Almost No Trouble to Make.

If you haven't time and materials to dress your tea cosy as a French aristocrat or a colonial dame, don't despair. Instead of allowing the teapot to get cold for want of wearing attire of the conventional type, sally forth to the shopping district, purchase a medium-sized doll, amputate it from the waist down and dress it in a circular cape made of whatever flowered material is in the house. The garment should fit smoothly over the doll's shoulders and become only gradually wider as it lengthens sufficiently to cover the cosy. In order that the lower edge shall not crinkle up or sag inward, there should be a hem wide enough to accommodate a whaleboe. The fronts of the cloak are joined above an inner staying strap and may be fitted closely about the neck under a fancy collar of lace or embroidery. On the cosy's head is worn a witch's cap made of material matching the cape and trimmed in a way to emphasize the tall peak. The cap consists of two triangles of the brocaded or flowered silk, lined with buckram to give it stiffening and adjusted to the head so that the seams come in at the center of the front and back. The practical feature about this new tea cosy costume is that it may be easily removed and dry-cleaned, whereas the more elaborate costumes of this sort nearly always are useless when soiled.

ERMINE MODISH



The stole muff pictured have especial grace, because of the rounded ends of the scarf and the effective use of the tails in trimming. Ermine is immensely fashionable for evening wear and is a belt that looks well with frocks of every light color, as well as with dark velvets.

Care of Street Suit.

The sensible woman will never wear her street costume in the house a minute longer than is necessary.

With a good-looking street costume several inexpensive house frocks, gingham for morning and voile for afternoon and evenings, and perhaps an evening frock, a woman in moderate circumstances is well fixed. She will not have her wardrobe crowded with half-worn garments for which she has no use, and which are fast going out of style. These few garments will be worn and will be in vogue until worn out. Then when the seasons change she will feel that she can conscientiously purchase a new outfit.

Lace Crib Quilt.

Irish lace is widely used for baby garments, and may be seen on all the little things from wee shoes to tiny hats, and particularly on the coats. One of its newest uses is for a crib quilt unlined. This is made entirely of the Irish lace, with wide slits in it, through which a broad pale blue satin ribbon runs.

INGENIOUS BAG FOR HORSES

Feed Runs Through Tube From Storage Compartment to Feeding Place in Front End.

An ingenious feed bag for horses has been designed by an Oregon man. In the front is a strap that fastens over the horse's head and in the rear is a small strap that buckles through his collar. As held in horizontal position, it is noticeable that the rear portion of the bag is smaller than the mouth and that it narrows toward the center. Through this narrowed section runs a tube and through this tube the feed flows from the storage compartment, in the rear, to the feeding compartment in front. When the bag is not in use it can be effectually closed by folding the feeding section longitudinally and then transversely, thus completely shutting the opening between the two. When the bag is empty it collapses completely, owing to the triangular construction of the storage part.

SUCCULENT FOOD FOR STOCK

Little Added Expense in Providing Animals With Roots or Silage—Store Under Feed Alley.

(By R. G. WEATHERSTONE.)

Just as one enjoys eating an apple occasionally—especially during the winter, when less fruit and vegetables are used than during the summer—just so the live stock in the winter, when their rations consist largely of dry feed, need and appreciate some form of succulent food. There is very little added expense in supplying animals with a reasonable amount of succulent food, either in the form of roots or silage. For a herd of 12 or more cows, this succulent food is most cheaply supplied by the use of silage; but for the smaller herd, or for a man without a silo, roots afford an excellent substitute for silage.

By care in preparing the soil and growing the crop, from 15 to 25 tons of roots, like mangles, rutabagas or stock carrots, can be grown per acre. They can be stored under the feeding alley, or in a pit outside of the barn, at very little expense. Twenty tons of roots will supply 10 cows 20 pounds per day each for 200 days, and can be grown and harvested at a cost of less than $40. The nutrients contained in 20 tons of roots are worth $30 when bran is worth $20 per ton; so the feeding value of the roots is sufficient to pay for the cost of production, besides the additional advantage of their supplying the succulence needed by the animal.

KEEPS SHEEP FROM JUMPING

Much Success Attained by Use of Light Board Strapped Around Neck of Breachy Animal.

One of our Illinois subscribers has tried with good success the plan of hanging by a broad strap a light board around the neck of the breachy sheep, says the Iowa Homestead. The board should be of such size and so hung that it will strike the sheep's knees when it tries to jump. The shape of board and the manner of hanging it are shown in the illustration.

Lice on Pigs.

Do not imagine that the cold weather will discourage the lice on the pigs. Better kill the pests now and then go at them again a month later.

GOOD SIRE MOST ECONOMICAL

Pure-Bred Bull Is Cheapest Investment Farmer Can Make in Building Up Standard of Herd.

(By RAY P. SPEER, Minnesota College of Agriculture.)

It has been demonstrated again and again that the cheapest investment that can be made by a farmer who is trying to build up the standard of a herd of cattle lies in the purchase of a good pure-bred bull. It is not necessary to buy several high-priced females as a basis for the average herd, nor is it economical. The most economical results can be obtained by buying a bull with masculinity enough behind his good breeding to stamp his likeness upon the calves secured.

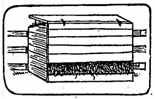
A striking proof of this has been shown on the cattle show circuit at various state fairs this fall. One of many instances will suffice. Recently a prominent state fair judge had to choose between two cows with the same dam, but sired by different bulls, for the female championship of the breed. So strikingly similar in type was each of them to its own sire, though the dam was the same, that there was no trouble in distinguishing between the two. The one that had been produced by the more outstanding sire was so superior to the one that had been produced by the less superior bull that there was no trouble about the selection.

The principle illustrated is practical value to the farmer who is thinking of beginning a herd with limited capital, or who has a very common herd that he desires to grade up. An average group of calves will be far superior to their commonly bred mothers if a good pure-bred bull is used. Such a bull can be purchased very reasonably if proper care is taken by the purchaser.

ALFALFA FEEDER FOR SWINE

Excellent Methods of Supplying Hay to Porkers is Shown in Illustration—Cover is Needed.

A good way to keep the hogs supplied with alfalfa hay is to have a box as shown in the cut on a dry spot just inside the fence. Bolt or nail it to the fence to keep the hogs from rooting it about and upsetting it. The open space should not be too wide or considerable hay will be wasted.



An Alfalfa Feeder for Hogs.

The hogs will eat more and waste less if they can get but a sprig or two of hay at a time, says the Missouri Valley Farmer. The brighter the hay the better the porkers will like it and the more good it will do them. Be sure and have a cover on the box.

Silage for Horses.

Experiments at the Pennsylvania station showed that horses can gradually be accustomed to silage, and can eat it safely when it is sound and made from mature silage corn. Some animals do not readily accept cottonseed meal, though the number of such animals is relatively small. Silage-fed horses consumed less grain and were better finished and sleeker than those fed hay as the sole roughage. The use also of cottonseed meal resulted in higher gain and better finish than where oats was the principal source of protein.

LIVE STOCK NOTES

Be careful not to let those fall pigs stop growing.

Which class of horses are you raising, the profit killer or the profit maker?

Sheep do not drink much water, but what little they drink must be absolutely clean.

Don't expect to make a profit on a flock of sheep unless you give them proper attention.

The ewes and lambs should be kept out of hearing of each other for a time when weaning.

Lack of thrift is induced by lack of care. A careless shepherd invariably makes a poor sheep.

Silage is well adapted for fattening lambs and for a part ration for wintering breeding sheep.

Sometimes a week's chill rains or cold weather will set the pigs back a month in their growth.

The day is not far distant when the scrub hog will be only a memory. Hasten its coming.

There is no animal that responds more quickly or more profitably to good treatment than the pig.

When hogs have free access to salt there is little danger of their eating enough to injure themselves.

Don't let the pigs get lousy. Spray them with kerosene emulsion, while eating, once every two weeks.

Sheep are a good medium for increasing the fertility of the farm of the man who has limited means.

It is almost impossible to crowd the young pigs too fast, provided you give the right kind of food and care.

Don't leave the sheep in a dry short pasture. Give them a chance in a fresh pasture, or give a good grain ration.

If hogs are lousy set a small post, wrapped tight with an old rope, in the ground and soak the rope with coal oil. The hog will do the rest.

ORIGIN of the CHRISTMAS TREE

WHO invented the Christmas tree? Whence does it come? It is a curious fact that most of the old chroniclers have thrown a veil of mystery around the Christmas tree and make no attempt to explain its origin.

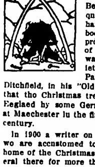
It has been stated that the tree came to us from Egypt. This legend is well propagated in old Irish and Welsh fairy tales. The idea is that in ancient Egypt they used a slip of the palm tree with twelve shoots on it at certain winter festivities. The tree symbolized the year with its twelve months.

Consequently, any one who is equal to the effort may believe that the modern Christmas tree represents that twelve-shooted slip of palm. Minds of less stalwart credulity may prefer to trace the Christmas tree back to Germany only, where they had Christmas trees long before they were ever heard of in this country or England or France.

The Christmas tree was not introduced into England from Germany until after the marriage of Queen Victoria to her German consort, Prince Albert. But where did the Germans get the Christmas tree idea from? S. J. Adair Fitz Gerald, writing in T. P.'s Weekly, offers an explanation of this by saying that far away back in the ages you find Teutons believing in a mystic ash tree, Yggdrasil, which, with its roots and branches, united the world of the living and the world of the dead. "At the foot of Yggdrasil sit the three Norns, who determine the destinies of men, and Yggdrasil's branches bear gifts for men to take."

Is that our Christmas tree? Anyhow, the idea that Prince Albert introduced it into Great Britain is very prevalent. One of the prettiest and most eagerly looked for events of the Christmastide—that of the setting up of the Christmas tree—is associated with the late Empress Frederick of Germany. Queen Victoria, after the birth of the princess royal, had Christmas celebrated at Windsor in 1840, and "on that occasion Prince Albert introduced the pretty German custom of decorating a Christmas tree. Since that period it has become a welcome custom for both rich and poor, and affords a graceful means of distributing little presents. It was probably first imported into Germany with the conquering legions of Drusus, and is alluded to by Virgil in the "Georgics."

It will be seen by this that the generally accepted notion is that Prince Albert was responsible for the British adoption of the pleasing tree and all that it means, symbolical and practical, to the youngsters. But on the threshold of this acceptation we are met with this statement from the "Greville Memoirs," under date Dec. 27, 1829, when Queen Victoria was yet but ten years old. "On Christmas day the Princess Lieven got up a little fete, such as is customary all over Germany. Three trees in great pots were put on a long table covered with linen; each tree was illuminated with three circular tiers of colored wax candles—blue, green, red and white. Before each was displayed a quantity of toys, gloves, handkerchiefs, workboxes, books and various articles, presents made to the owner of the tree." This princess was a Russian, and in her later days lived mostly in Paris. Then again Prof. Ditchfield, in his "Old English Customs," says that the Christmas tree was first imported into England by some German merchants who lived at Manchester in the first years of the nineteenth century.



In 1900 a writer on folklore said: "Although we are accustomed to consider Germany the home of the Christmas tree, it has not been general there for more than a couple of centuries. Old people are still living whose parents never saw one in Germany. The decoration of houses with olive leaves and green branches, as in England at Christmas, is a far more ancient custom, and can be noticed in Botticelli's picture of "The Adoration of the Shepherds," in the National Gallery in London. It is, as Fritz Ortwein observes, a distinct remnant of an ancient heathen custom, as at the turn of the year during the twelve days of the Jul festival in honor of Woden, greenery could be fetched by all from the woods without punishment, and every hall was decorated with green leaves and branches.

Again, in old works on English customs we find many references to the decorating of the interior of the dwellings, as well as the pious adornment of the churches with greenery, and the introduction of a fir tree as symbolical of the palm. In the halls of the barons and the squires and in the gigantic kitchens of the farmers a fir tree ever held prominent place, but whether ordinarily decorated or not is not specifically recorded. Here we are in doubt. In all probability the remaining fruits of the orchards of the year were hung upon the branches as a propitiation to the gods of the fruits of the earth to insure good harvests.

Going abroad we get fuller knowledge of these things. The custom of carrying away branches and trees from the woods at Christmas time in various parts of Austria became so extensive on account of the superstitions of the peasantry that at Salzburg, in 1755, and at Nuremberg, in 1768, severe by-laws were issued against persons purloining from the forests. In some regions of Hungary a solemn procession with a decorated tree takes place through each village before the shepherd play begins. "It is adorned with ribbons and fruit, and is supposed to symbolize the tree of knowledge. Although most of the Christian customs adhered to by the Austrian-German peasant can be traced back to heathenish Germanen rites, some dispute the use of a tree at the Jul festivities; nevertheless, it is certain that in Sweden needle pines and firs were set up at this time before the houses." Teutzel of Saxony, an antiquarian authority on these subjects, says: "The ancient heathen sat before their houses between two crossed pine trees and ate and drank at the turn of the year for nineteen days."

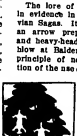
The Christmas tree was introduced into Austria some eighty years ago by a Duchess of Wurtemberg and spread throughout Germany. About 1840 it is supposed to have taken fresh root in England, and became highly popular. Both Thackeray and Dickens seized hold of the idea of happiness begot of Christmas gatherings and the Christmas tree, and Charles Dickens in 1850 used "The Christmas Tree" as a title for one of his annual stories.

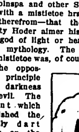
Although Christmas was not celebrated in the first centuries of the Christian era, there are indications in the records of early Roman history of the setting up of a decorated tree at Christmas time and the presentation of gifts of fruit and toys. The Romans are supposed to have taken the idea from the early Egyptians.

Centuries old, the customs of Christmas observance have taken myriad forms in the various countries of the world. In many cases they perpetuate some ancient custom which long antedates the advent of Christianity. Such are the customs which have grown up around the mistletoe, worshiped by the ancient Druids of Britain as a sacred and magical plant. An old English writer, speaking of the Druids' celebration of the winter solstice, our Christmas, says:

"This was the most respectable festival of our Druids, called Yuletide; when the mistletoe, which they called all-heal, was carried in their hands and laid on their altars as an emblem of the salutiferous advent of Messiah. This mistletoe they cut off the trees with their upright hatchets of brass, called celts, put upon ends of their staffs, which they carried in their hands. Innumerable are these instruments found all over the British isles. The custom is still preserved, and lately at York on the eve of Christmas day they carry mistletoe to the high altar of the cathedral, and proclaim a public and universal liberty, pardon and freedom to all sorts of inferior and even wicked people, at the gates of the city, towards their four quarters of heaven."

The lore of the strange plant is prominently in evidence in the Volnspa and other Scandinavian Sagas. It was with a mistletoe branch—or an arrow prepared therefrom—that the blind and heavy-headed deity Hoder aimed his deadly blow at Balder, the god of light or benevolent principle of northern mythology. The inspiration of the use of the mistletoe was, of course, due to the opposing principle—of darkness or evil. The plant which furnished the deadly dart grew on the slope of Asgard, and was the sole agent known to gods or men—among poisonous plants—which had not given definite promise to Freya to prove harmless if used against the person of her son Balder. Thus Scandinavian mythical lore accounts for the death of the latter. And accordingly, a traditional idea of the poisonous properties of the mistletoe is found to persist in remote regions of the north and west of Europe, even to the present day. In Great Britain (in the Forest of Dean) it has been used down to recent date as a popular remedy in the treatment of cardiac troubles. Like the strophanthus of African arrow poison fame, it proved a reliable substitute for digitalis.





Kissing under the mistletoe is all that now remains of a once horrible Druid rite.

The ceremonies which the mistletoe figured in among the ancient Druids always accorded it a place of honor. The myths that clung around it in their wondering, puzzling minds were many more than the few that have come to us in these later years. But, old as they are, those hoary, heathen myths lack the true flavor of antiquity when it comes to measuring traditions by the centuries.

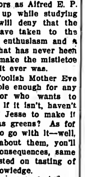
Oh, we do not by any means owe our mistletoe to the Druids. We can go back so much further for the first adventures of the mistletoe that the Druids become merely modern innovators. It was one of the noblest of the trees in Paradise, the lordly tree of good and evil; and on its twig hung the apple which Mother Eve plucked with such disastrous consequences. Alas for Mother Eve and Father Adam! And alas for us, their punished heirs-at-law divine! But alas, too, for the wicked, handsome, tempting tree of knowledge which put humanity in such graceless plight! Upon its lofty crown, its massive trunk, its delicious fruit, descended the universal curse. It shriveled away from the horrified earth; it dwindled to the meanest smallness; it was cast out into the bitter cold; it became a parasite and beggar, existing by the bounty of vulgar neighbors. Only in the pearly translucence of its shrunken fruit, the most trivial of berries, did it preserve some semblance of its once radiant splendor.

And it has preserved some of its pristine virtues, too, in traditional Christian lore, as if it were still hedged about with a vestige of the glory that arrayed it in Paradise.

Time was, and time is now, when epilepsy is one of the scourges of mankind; only now we look for its cure, as we look for its cause, in quite natural means and conditions. The notion that some poor devil with the falling sickness has been cursed from on high is held scarcely compatible, in popular science, with the principles of eternal justice or with cold observation of cause and effect.

But in times that were, in Wales, when an epileptic developed the symptoms characteristic of the disorder, it was commonly believed that he was being scourged with the "rod of Christ," and that was the name by which the disease went, although it had another designation as well—St. Valentine's sickness. The cure for it was believed to lie in the Rod of Jesse. The use of the mistletoe as the Rod of Jesse in epilepsy was general and, if faith can work wonders, perhaps the miracle of cure did sometimes attend its employment.

Perhaps it didn't, if hard-headed science choose to take a shy at that gracious addition to the list of miracle-working agents. But whether it did or didn't the mistletoe's rare birth and fruition still carry with them the tenderest of Christian faiths, as they carry, too, the story of humanity's most far-reaching disaster. It is one of the Christmas greens which has the warrant of religious associations dating back to the very beginnings of man's creation, even as it is accorded the sublime honor of typifying the ancestral origins of the Redeemer of Man himself.



But what about the mistletoe kiss?

Hm! To tell the truth, if we want to be consistently Christian in our Christmas greens and the purposes to which they should be put, there isn't anything about it, at least of any records which such careful investigators as Alfred E. P. Raymond Dowling have dug up while studying the general subject. None will deny that the most consistent Christians have taken to the mistletoe kiss with abundant enthusiasm and a faith in its excellent results that has never been surpassed. But that doesn't make the mistletoe kiss any more Christian than it ever was.

Isn't the excellent story of foolish Mother Eve and the original mistletoe apple enough for any reasonable Christmas decorator who wants to justify its employment? And if it isn't, haven't we the legend of the Rod of Jesse to make it distinctly one of the Christmas greens? As for the kisses that are supposed to go with it—well, if you insist on knowing about them, you'll simply have to take the consequences, same as Eve did when she insisted on tasting of that confounded tree of knowledge.

The mistletoe kiss seems not to be Christian at all—Druidical, probably, and therefore heathenish, and therefore very, very wrong. So, all young men who encounter it, artfully suspended where a pair of ripe, red lips must pass, do you piously refrain or, more piously, tear down the hoary old temptation and flee the accursed roof, as if it were the house of Arria Marcella and you were not Gautier's young Frenchman. And you, maidens, give leave to no pagan rites; remember the fate of your poor Grandmother Eve and beware lest the fruit of the mistletoe, accursed tree of knowledge, prove now more bitter in the mouth than it did in Eden.

But if you have ivy, wreathe it generously, for the French know it as the herb of St. John, the disciple whom the Savior loved, the emblem of pure friendship, the vine that heeds not decay and death of its beloved, but clings ever more closely as the fall impends and bears up its falling ally against all adversity. Learned students of these legends have surmised, too, that it may be the herb of St. John the Baptist, who is usually pictured as the boy in his camel's-hair coat, gazing at his cousin, the infant Jesus.

ITCHING AND BURNING

Iberia, Mo.—"I was troubled with scalp eczema for about five years and tried everything I heard of, but all of no avail. The doctors told me I would have to have my head shaved. Being a woman, I hated the idea of that. I was told by a friend that the Cuticura Remedies would do me good. This spring I purchased two boxes of Cuticura Ointment and one cake of Cuticura Soap. After using one box of Cuticura Ointment I considered the cure permanent, but continued to use it to make sure and used about one-half the other box. Now I am entirely well. I also used the Cuticura Soap.

"The disease began on the back of my head, taking the form of a ringworm, only more severe, rising to a thick, rough scale that would come off when soaked with oil or warm water, bringing a few hairs each time, but in a few days would form again, larger each time, and spreading until the entire back of the head was covered with the scale. This was accompanied by a terrible itching and burning sensation. Now my head is completely well and my hair growing nicely." (Signed) Mrs. Geo. F. Clark, Mar. 25, 1912.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyzer

THE LOTUS FLOWER

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

THE usually quiet Rue du General Appert was in a state of great excitement. Carriages and cabs drove to the house of Madame H——, and crowds of well-dressed people elbowed their way to the salons on the first floor. It was a few days before Mademoiselle Yvonne H——'s marriage, and a big display had been made of the trousseau and presents.

The three reception-rooms were thrown open, and long narrow tables covered with jewelry, fans, plate, and works of art of every description lined the walls. At the principal table, where jewelry and lace were exhibited, a glass case had been specially fitted to guard the contents against indiscreet fingers.

As a rule, detectives—who by the uninitiated are often taken for poor relations—are engaged to guard the property, as it is difficult to know how many uninvited may manage to make their way into the house. Madame H——, however, had not taken this precaution; and this mistake caused me to make her acquaintance.

It was discovered that a costly pendant had mysteriously disappeared, and early the next morning I was in the Rue du General Appert, seated opposite Madame H—— (the widow of a wealthy merchant), her daughter Yvonne, and a fat, red-faced, pompous gentleman, whom the ladies addressed as Uncle Jerome. He was loudest in his lamentations, and I soon discovered the reason: the pendant had been presented by him, and he seemed to take it as a personal affront that the thief should have selected his gift.

I had many questions to ask, so that I had to cut him short and beg the ladies to show me the glass case from which the jewel had been abstracted.

This case was absolutely intact, and the thief must have watched his opportunity to raise it unobserved. Only a man with a cool head and a steady hand would have dared to attempt this, in a room full of people with half a dozen attendants near the tables.

Uncle Jerome had already questioned the servants, driving them to the verge of hysterics. I came to the conclusion that they knew nothing, and that no information of value could be obtained from the ladies or their loud-voiced relative.

While I was examining the room in search of a possible clue, I heard Uncle Jerome call out in angry tones:

"And what about the baron's coat? Does Monsieur Goron know anything about that?"

I turned around.

"What baron, and what coat?"

"Well, you see, Monsieur Goron," said Madame H——, "it was altogether an unfortunate day, for when Baron S—— asked for his coat it was nowhere to be found."

"Has anything else been stolen?" I inquired.

"No," said Madame H——. "I think this was quite enough for one afternoon."

"I think so too," interrupted the uncle; "the baron must have a fine opinion of the people you receive."

And turning to me, he added:

"I have the pleasure of being one of the baron's friends, and it makes it very awkward for me—very! I introduced him here."

At my request Madame made a rough sketch of the pendant. It was of Oriental design, set with large diamonds, ending in a small lotus flower.

I also asked for the address of the baron, whom I wanted to see about the coat, and learned he was a Russian, very rich, living in the Avenue de l'Alma. As I rose to leave, Uncle Jerome insisted on a minute's private conversation.

"Monsieur Goron," he began when we were alone, "I did not like to speak before my sister-in-law; but I consider it my duty to mention a certain gentleman to you—Alfred O——, a relative by marriage of Madame H——, a good-for-nothing, who has been mixed up in several ugly affairs. I begged my sister-in-law repeatedly not to receive him; but he plays the 'funny-man,' amuses the ladies, and makes himself at home here—too much so."

"Do you mean to imply—"

"I imply nothing, I am only giving you a hint."

The valet opened the door for me, and at that moment a closed cab drove up; a young man alighted and remained talking to a lady inside. A lace veil hid her face.

"Who is that?" I asked the valet.

"That's Monsieur Alfred," he replied, with the shadow of a sneer, "and that woman inside is his friend 'Tips.'"

"Who is Tips?"

"Not much good."

Alfred, apparently was not a persona grata.

Thus far I had no clue whatever. I therefore resolved not to act before I had seen both the baron and Alfred.

In my office two inspectors met me with smiling faces.

"You were right, sir," said one, "about these bicycle thieves. We arrested them this morning, and found about twenty cycles in the place you mentioned."

Nodding to his companion: "That will be good news for Tips. Hers was among the lot."

"Who the deuce is Tips? This is the second time within an hour I hear her mentioned."

"Her name, sir, is Georgette Chevallier. She was married to a trainer, a brute, who beat her and drank himself to death. She speaks English as well as French, and is well known to the English trainers and jockeys in Chantilly and Maisons Laffitte, who christened her 'Tips' because she always wants to know the winner. You can see her almost every night at the Cafe Sylvain. She likes late suppers. A month ago her bicycle was stolen. I happened to be in the police commissary's office when she came to tell him of it. I promised her to do my best, and have sent her a note that will make her happy. I reckon she will be here to-morrow to ask for her bike."

Tips had aroused my curiosity.

"When she comes I want to see her."

"All right, sir."

Before calling on Baron S—— I made an inquiry about Alfred O——, and what I heard was deplorable. The fortune he had inherited from his mother was squandered in less than two years, and his father, a retired colonel, was almost ruined by his son's extravagance. Alfred raised money when he could, and in a gambling-club had been accused of attempting to cheat. This charge had never been proved, and it ended in a duel, when he ran two inches of steel into his traducer's body. He belonged to a good family, and was distantly related to Madame H——, whose house he visited regularly.

The baron, I learned, had an estate in Russia, where he passed the summer. The winters he spent in Paris and he was very popular in the world ou l'on s'muse. He had an apartment in the Avenue de l'Alma; and I went there toward eleven in the morning.

His servant, a tall, well-built young man, informed me in bad French with a strong Russian accent that his master was having his bath, and would receive me in a few minutes. He soon appeared, a distinguished, aristocratic man.

I apologized for disturbing him so early, and begged him to give me an account of the disappearance of his coat.

"Between ourselves," he smiled, "I am surprised these accidents do not happen oftener. This is my second winter in Paris, and the third time I have attended one of these functions. They are a boon to the Paris thieves. I am sorry I lost my fur coat; it was valuable. My idiot of a servant will tell you how it occurred—Boris!"

The valet, at the baron's request, then explained to me, in his abominable French, that he had been waiting in the hall for his master, with the coat over his arm. Finding it cumbersome, with so many people passing in and out, he had put it in a little room leading from the hall, and when he went to fetch it it was gone.

"But why did you not leave it in charge of one of the servants?" I asked.

"I expected my master to come down every moment, and as the door of the little room was open I could keep my eyes on the coat all the time. I may have lost sight of it for a second."

The baron shrugged his shoulders, and I heard the word "fool."

I put a few questions; but as neither the baron nor Boris could supply any further information, I withdrew. In the room I had detected a peculiar perfume, very faint, without being able to fix it with certainty. I could not positively say whether it emanated from the room itself or from one of the men. Slight as it was, it caught my attention, as my sense of smell is acute.

I had written a note to Alfred O—— asking him to call, and found him waiting for me. I need not describe that type of young man—to be met on the race-course, at first nights, at fashionable gatherings—to whom life is nothing but a huge joke. He roared with laughter when I broached the subject of the robbery.

"Please excuse me, Monsieur Goron, the whole thing is so ludicrous. Do you know, that Uncle Jerome, whom you saw this morning, darkly hinted that I stole the pendant? I heard it from the little German governess. I think he does it out of revenge because I made fun of it. You never saw anything so ugly. The diamonds are magnificent, but the design is grotesque, with that silly little flower dangling at the end."

"You were at Madame H——'s the day the pendant was stolen?"

"Yes, the greater part of the afternoon."

"Did you notice anything likely to throw any light on the affair?"

"Nothing whatever. It seems very strange. Uncle Jerome is terribly upset; but, I think, more on account of the coat. The old chap is proud of his acquaintance with a baron!"

The next day when I was busy investigating a case that had happened during the night, I was informed that Georgette Chevallier, alias Tips, was down-stairs, having come about her bicycle.

"Show her in at once," I said.

Georgette was pretty. She was small, remarkably graceful, with large, brown, intelligent eyes.

"You wanted to see me?" she remarked in a gentle voice.

"Madame Georgette——" I began.

"Please call me Tips; everybody does."

"Very well; Tips, since you prefer it, I had the pleasure of seeing you a couple of days ago."

"Me? Where?"

"In a cab; you were talking to your friend."

"What friend?"

"Alfred O——."

"He is not my friend, Monsieur Goron. Not in the sense you mean; and I do not understand you."

"Never mind, Tips. By the way, are you glad your bicycle is found?"

"Rather. But the stupid people at the Police Commissariat are fussing to make me prove I am the rightful owner of the machine. I can give you the receipt of the maker; I have brought it with me."

She put her hand inside her muff, and with her purse drew out a small silk pocket handkerchief which she laid on my writing-table. I took it up, for I immediately detected the same faint perfume that had struck me at the baron's chambers.

"What scent is that, Tips?" I asked.

"There is no scent on it," she replied crossly. "I never use any!"

"Do you mean to tell me you smell nothing?" And I held the handkerchief to her nose.

"No; nothing."

THE CHANGES IN THE MANS FACE WHILE I SPOKE WERE EXTRAORDINARY

"In that case, Tips, all I can say is that this handkerchief cannot be your property. How do you come by it?"

She bit her lip, and, after a silence began:

"I really do not understand why you are so interested in my handkerchiefs. I call it indiscreet. And now, allow me to wish you good-morning."

"Please sit down again, Tips, and excuse my being what you call indiscreet. But I must and will know more about this handkerchief. Once more I ask you how you came by it!"

"I picked it up last night at the Cafe Sylvain."

"Do you know who lost it?"

"Yes; a man."

"What man?"

"I don't know him."

"Tips, speak the truth."

"I am speaking the truth. I swear it. I had dined at Sylvain's last night and was drinking my coffee, when a gentleman at the table next to me asked the waiter for his bill. I fancy he must have taken a little too much champagne, for he dropped first his pocket-book, then his keys, and finally several gold pieces. After he had left I saw this handkerchief on the floor, and when I picked it up a small glittering thing fell out of it. I saw it was of little value and put it in my pocket for luck."

"Show it to me, Tips," I said.

She took it out of her purse and threw it on the table. It was a tiny lotus flower in green enamel and gold.

I gazed at it a long time, and could hardly repress a smile when, looking up, I noticed the expression in Tips' eyes.

"Why do you laugh, Monsieur Goron?" she asked. "And do you mind explaining what it all means?"

"I am laughing for several reasons, Tips; but especially because you eye me suspiciously. It is the world reversed."

She was holding the handkerchief to her nose, and sniffing hard.

"It may be my imagination," she said, "but I fancy I trace a slight smell of violets. In that the scent you meant?"

"No, Tips. Perfumes, like flowers, have a language of their own, a language which I am afraid you would not understand. I shall keep the handkerchief and the enameled flower, for I have a notion that I shall come across the person who is now anxiously looking for both. Will you come back this afternoon?"

"Certainly." And she tripped out of the room.

I had made no disclosures to her, and let her go, fully convinced of the truth of her story. I was beginning to see daylight, and the matter was also growing in interest.

My first visit was to Madame H——, whom fortunately I found at home. She recognized the lotus flower as forming part of the stolen pendant, and pressed me with questions, which I refused to answer.

Then I went to the Cafe Sylvain. Tips' statement was confirmed by the waiter. A dark, close-shaven man had dined there the night before, and had dropped several things. After he had gone the waiter had found a pair of gloves, which he brought me. They, too, exhaled the same faint, curious smell. Thrusting them into my pocket, I promptly drove to the Avenue de l'Alma.

The baron—the concierge informed me—was out of town. I mounted the stairs to his apartment on the second floor, and was just going to press the bell when I quickly withdrew my hand, and stood motionless—I had heard a noise. Somebody near the door was moving a box of a heavy piece of furniture. It was Boris, the valet. I heard him bump against something, utter an exclamation of pain and relieve his feelings in vile language.

I softly stole down-stairs, and in less than three-quarters of an hour returned with two of my men.

Boris opened the door. His master, he said, had gone to Nice.

"That does not matter," I remarked; "my visit is to you. I have come to bring you the news that I have discovered the man who stole your master's coat. I can even give you the address of the house where you will find it."

The man eyed me and my companions with astonishment, and remarked that his master would be glad to hear it.

"That remains to be seen," I continued. "For the moment I have to deal with you, and I must say that I am surprised your master should have selected you to assist him in his work. I never saw a man so bungle things.

"Your master and you go to Madame H——'s house on an expedition of a peculiar nature. Your master—apparently a great expert—performs a marvelous trick of slight-of-hand in making a jewel disappear from a glass case, and then diverts suspicion by posing as a victim. That story of the stolen coat was cleverly invented; but from the way you told it, it dawned upon me that you might be the supposed thief and that the coat is here now.

"Your next mistake was also very bad; your master, having extracted the diamonds from the pendant, left you the gold setting—no doubt by way of perquisite—and you put the little lotus flower in your pocket. In the evening you wanted to play the 'swell.' You dined in a fashionable restaurant; but you got so drunk that you dropped your gloves, your handkerchief, and also the gold flower.

"Worse still, your handkerchief and gloves tell—I should rather say smell—their own tale. People in your profession should not use scent. Unfortunately for your master, his olfactory nerves are less developed than his other senses, otherwise he would not have allowed you to use it. I noticed that smell when I called after the robbery.

"Now comes your crowning performance: Your Russian accent was as good a thing as ever I heard. I even own that at first it deceived me. But you should have remembered that when a man once adopts a foreign accent he must stick to it—even when he is alone. An hour ago, when you knocked your shins, you started swearing in the purest Parisian slang.

"And the result of these mistakes is that it is now my duty to arrest you."

The changes in the man's face, while I spoke, were extraordinary. Surprise, disappointment, fear, despair, shame, alternately were depicted, until finally his features assumed an expression of resignation, which they retained.

At my request he showed me the stolen coat. It was hanging in one of the cupboards.

The man seemed numbed. When we arrived at the Police Prefecture I gave orders to let him what we call in police parlance "simmer" in a room by himself to collect his thoughts.

An hour later I sent for him. The clock struck four. I remembered Tips. She had arrived.

"Do you know that gentleman?" I asked her, pointing to Boris.

"Why, yes; he's the man who sat at the table next to me at Sylvain's, and——"

"That will do, Tips."

I took her to one of the rooms adjoining my office, and said:

"You have unconsciously placed yourself in danger, and unconsciously have rendered me a service, for which I thank you. Let me now give you a word of advice. Don't frequent cafes, and if ever again you find something in a public place, don't put it in your pocket. It might prove fatal."

Tips' eyes opened wide.

"No, Tips; I have no time for explanation. Good-by."

And I returned to my prisoner.

Boris was pacing up and down the room, and, in a hoarse voice, said:

"It is all up with me. The smash was bound to come. The man I am serving bought his title in Italy. I met him three years ago in Moscow, in a club where I was one of the attendants in the baccarat-room. These Russian clubs are hells. One night I gave way to temptation. I was conducting a half-tipsy gentleman to his carriage. His portfolio, full of bank-notes, was hanging out of his pocket, and I took it. I thought nobody was near; but Baron S—— had watched me. He told me to come to his rooms that night, and forced me to write a confession of my crime, promising not to denounce me so long as I served him faithfully. The next day I discovered that he was a dangerous adventurer; he has come to Paris for a big coup that he supposes will bring him in a lot of money."

"Why, then, did he steal that pendant, a most difficult undertaking, where he ran a terrible risk?"

"I have asked myself that question several times. I am inclined to think he was short of money. On the other hand, he is a strange man. Danger attracts him, and I would not be surprised if the very difficulty of the thing tempted him."

Heaving a sigh, he added:

"I don't care what becomes of me, Monsieur Goron, if I but get out of that man's clutches."

The baron had gone to Nice, and Boris gave me his address.

I had telegraphed to Nice to keep an eye upon him until my arrival. I waited until he returned from the club to his hotel, and then informed him that he would have to come with me to Paris, to answer the charge of having stolen a jewel.

He eyed me for a moment with a slight lifting of the eyebrows.

"I must warn you, Monsieur Goron," he said, "that you are risking your position by arresting me on such a preposterous charge."

"I take the risk."

He did not utter a syllable when we overhauled his luggage, nor when we searched his pockets. And all the way to the capital he remained silent.

At the Police Prefecture he made a formal protest against his arrest, and then drove with me and an official to his apartment, which had been kept under observation. Except the famous fur coat I found nothing of interest beyond a quantity of correspondence and a heap of documents—chiefly in Russian—which I sealed in his presence and took back to the Prefecture.

On the following morning the baron was to be confronted with Boris.

I had informed Madame H—— that Baron S—— had been arrested; and a couple of hours later she and Uncle Jerome came to my office in great alarm to tell me that they did not want to prefer a charge against the baron.

I looked at them in amazement.

"Yes," they said, speaking in excited tones, "this case must never come to trial. We dare not face the scandal."

"What scandal?" I shouted.

"The scandal in the press. Why, we should become the laughing-stock of all Paris!"

"You surely cannot expect me," I sternly returned, "to enter into such considerations. I think myself lucky in having caught that fellow, and he certainly shall not escape. Moreover, you do not seem to be aware that even your withdrawing the charge would not further matters as far as you are concerned, for the case is already in the public prosecutor's hands."

They whispered together, and left.

But it was written that this affair should be fraught with surprises.

I was asked to call at once on the examining magistrate on an urgent matter, and, with a grim smile, he handed me a document.

It was a demand from the Russian Government for the extradition of a so-called Baron S—— on a charge of forging bonds, swindling, and bribing state officials.

It meant transportation for life.

The baron's nerves nearly gave way when this news was communicated to him. But he made a violent effort, and, turning to me said:

"I have a request to make of you, Monsieur Goron. Do what you can for that poor wretch Boris. He has nothing to do with this Russian business. I trust you understand me?"

It spoke well for the man that in this hour of trouble he thought of the humble companion whose ruin he had worked.

Things altogether underwent an odd change. It was decided not to proceed against the baron in connection with the jewel robbery, as it was doubtful whether, owing to Madame H——'s attitude, a conviction could be obtained.

After the usual formalities the baron was handed over to the Russian officials, and twenty years' transportation fell to his share.

Boris was released from custody after a severe admonition. I never again came across him.

One day a lady asked to see me. On her card I read: Madame Alfred O——. She entered and I recognized Tips, looking as pretty as ever.

"I knew you would be glad to see me," she began.

"Very glad, Tips."

"You see, we were married six months ago. Alfred inherited a little money, and is quite a reformed character. He has become a bookmaker, and has a fine connection. I help him in the business."

"Naming winners, I suppose?"

"Of course! Isn't my name Tips?"

Supreme Court's Little Suits Make Big Problems

THESE LITTLE SUITS ARE SOMETHIN' FIERCE LITTLE SUITS
SUPREME COURT
W-

WASHINGTON.—From small beginnings have arisen some of the most perplexing questions to be passed upon by the Supreme court this fall and winter.

Thomas W. McComb had splendid luck duck hunting in Tinicum township, Delaware county, Pennsylvania, a year or so ago. Probably to his surprise that day's outing will bring him to the Supreme court. He was prosecuted for using an automatic gun in the hunt. In defense he attacked the constitutionality of the Pennsylvania law against the use of that type of weapon.

A burn on the back of Anne Sweeney of the District of Columbia forms the basis of another suit. On its outcome will depend whether physicians are liable for burns by X-rays in photographing patients.

Over the meaning of the word "auction" comes a case from the Hawaiian islands. Arrests were made there for the alleged violation of a law requiring a license for sales at auction. The sales in question were made to retail fish dealers. The point is raised whether this was an auction, and if so, if there is a distinction between "public" and "private" auctions.

Whether the government must pay for the forage for two horses for the late Maj. Nathaniel H. McLean of Cincinnati and for two servants is involved in another case. The point arises as a result of his reinstatement in the army. The horses and servants were employed after he retired from the army and before he was reinstated by congress.

Whether the back of a bay window may form a "party wall" is the basis of a dispute between Lewis E. Smoot and the Hoyt heirs of the District of Columbia, to come before the court for decision.

Postmaster General Hitchcock a Night Worker

AM
GUESS NOBODY WILL BOTHER ME AT THIS HOUR
W-

IT took one man, from a western city, nearly a week to find out something about Frank H. Hitchcock, the postmaster-general, that many Washingtonians acquainted with the inner workings of the postoffice department knew.

This man went day after day at 9 o'clock in the morning to Mr. Hitchcock's office and waited patiently to see the postmaster-general. He began to have set ideas about the postmaster-general and what he considered the necessity of making cabinet officers do more work, or at least maintain some sort of regular office hours.

On the night of the fifth day the man dropped into the postoffice building. He did not know just why, but he thought he might get some "tip" from the watchman. The only person in sight was the elevator man.

"I want to see Mr. Hitchcock," he said. "Can you—"

"Have you an appointment with him?" interrupted the elevator man, with his hand on the lever ready to start the car.

"Yes," he quickly replied.

"All right," the elevator operator said, as they shot up to the fifth floor. "I suppose you know where his office is?"

"You bet I do."

There he found several clerks working busily. His request to see the postmaster-general was taken in a most matter of fact way, and in two minutes he saw Mr. Hitchcock, completed his business and left for home on the midnight train.

FOR the purpose of promoting the international study of the Spanish language and literature there has just been organized here a society to be known as the Spanish-American Atheneum. At its first meeting, held a few nights ago, the speakers included Senor Riano, Spanish minister here; John Barrett, director general of the Pan-American union; Rev. Dr. Charles W. Currier, specialist on Spanish-American literature, and Mme. Blanche de Barait of Cuba.

The Spanish minister and all the Latin-American ministers here were made honorary vice-presidents of the organization and among those who already have signified their willingness to become corresponding members are the Princess Teresa of Bavaria, Sir Clements Markham, K. C. B.; Senor Quesada, former minister here from Cuba; Senor Rafael Altimira, Spain; Senor Jose T. Medina, Chile; Senor J. Lafone Quevedo, Argentina, and Dr. Rafael Villavicencio, president of the National Academy of History of Venezuela.

The society purposes to have frequent meetings, when there will be lectures and discussions on literary, historical and scientific subjects, and will issue a journal both in English and Spanish. While the headquarters will be here, the organization will be international in character and membership.

Honorary members will be chosen from time to time from people who have attained distinction in literary, scientific or historical work in connection with Spain and the Spanish American republics.

Some Good Things Left for the Hungry Ones

THERE are in the entire government service an army of more than 400,000 men and women. Of these more than 300,000 are protected by the civil service, some by law and some by executive order. Of the remaining 100,000 or so only 10,582 are direct presidential appointees. The remainder are appointed by the heads of departments, but will, of course, be subject to removal by the incoming administration. The salaries of these 100,000 office holders amount to about $30,000,000.

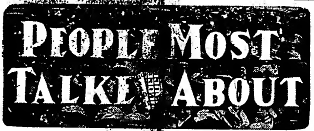
Of the 16,582 direct presidential appointments, 9,949 must be confirmed by the senate.

In addition to this large army of office holders and government employes, all under the executive branch of the government, there are more than 1,000 appointments under the control of congress. Part of these the Democrats now have, but they will gain more through the control of the United States senate.

President Wilson's available patronage disbursements will be much larger than the list which Grover Cleveland had at his disposal when he entered office in 1884, after the Democrats had been out in the cold for 28 long years. The number of offices since Cleveland's first administration has increased enormously.

In the sixteen years that have elapsed since Cleveland retired, the Democrats who were appointed to office by him have almost entirely been eliminated, except in offices and posts under the civil service, where many appointed under the Cleveland administration are still holding on. Some of these Cleveland appointees are now filling the highest places in the classified service.

PEOPLE MOST TALKED ABOUT



ONE OF UNCLE SAM'S MANY DETECTIVES

You haven't heard, have you, that in the work being done to assure you absolutely good oysters on all occasions, one of your most capable aids is a very charming young woman? She is Miss Ruth C. Greathouse, and she is a very important and busy personage just now that the oyster season is at its height.

Miss Greathouse is young—delightfully so. If one were called upon to judge by the amazingly childlike expression of her blue eyes, the freshness of her coloring, or the riot of curly locks, one might say "She's about eighteen." If one were called to make a guess by the very dignified letters of scientific degree following her name, or the importance of the work she does, one would place the figures among the years of spectacles and gray hairs.

Miss Greathouse is one of the expert scientists of the bacteriological division of the bureau of chemistry at Washington, and has done some of its most important and efficient work. Under the bacteriological division comes all the inspection of oysters and shellfish of all sorts as well as the testing of the milk supply.

The bureau of chemistry, under the food and drugs act, is able to seize and investigate only such goods as are intended for interstate commerce.

This seizing of goods that require immediate inspection makes it necessary that when this very capable and delightful girl detective for Uncle Sam starts on a seizing tour she must go prepared to make an immediate examination of the oysters. To be ready for such emergency she must carry a portable laboratory. These portable laboratories are of two sizes—the larger about the proportions of an average steamer trunk, and the smaller about the size of a good big suit case. Wherever Miss Greathouse goes about her work these "portables" go also.

"It all sounds very difficult," she said one day in speaking of her work, "but it's like a good many other things—it isn't half bad when you know more about it. Wherever it is possible, a man inspector is sent out with any young woman from the bureau of chemistry detailed on investigation work, and, [illegible] expected to be perfectly capable of taking care of the undertaking without any assistance, the men inspectors, out of pure courtesy, take most of the disagreeable part of the work."

DECLARES THAT TURKEY IS PROGRESSIVE

Gabriel Bie Ravndal, of Minnesota and South Dakota, American consul general at Constantinople, and honorary president of the chamber of commerce for the Levant, has been spending several days in Washington and New York before departing for his post. He has been in the United States for his annual leave of absence.

Mr. Ravndal states that Turkey offers a fine field for American brains and money and is making rapid strides in all branches of business.

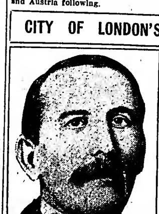
"If I were to tell you about all the changes which are taking place in the east, including Turkey," says General Ravndal, "I would probably be accused of being untruthful; and at the risk of such an accusation, I want to talk briefly about a few of them.

"Fifty years ago, Port Said was a small Arab encampment; now it has 50,000 inhabitants. Piraeus, the port of Athens, has grown in eighty years from a single hut to a city of 80,000. Beirut, the chief seaport of Syria, has grown to 25,000 in the same time, and many other places show an equal growth. There have been several land booms in Egypt in recent years. At the outbreak of the present war Turkey was building hundreds of miles of railways. Turkish revenues were increasing, and Ottoman statesmen were discussing seriously the possibility of a budget big enough to make both ends meet.

"When I left Constantinople two months ago they were tearing down old houses by the hundreds to widen and straighten streets and make them more sanitary. In 1823 Beirut could not boast of a single pane of glass except in the home of the British consul. Now Beirut has modern palaces, colleges, newspapers, and all of the other things that belong to an up-to-date city."

The United States, he said, had only one per cent of Turkey's foreign trade, but there is no good reason why it ought not to have as much as any other nation. England now leads in Turkish trade, with Germany, France and Austria following.

CITY OF LONDON'S NEW LORD MAYOR



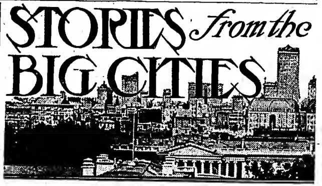
Once a year the lord mayor of London rides through the streets of his city, the old city, in all the trappings and regalia of office. He rides in a gilded coach and behind him come the city's minor officials and merrymakers.

It was once the custom at the lord mayor's show for those in the upper windows along Fleet street enthusiastically to hurl red-hot pennies on the indignant heads of those on the streets below.

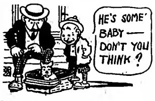
Sir Edward Burnett, the new lord mayor, comes to an office which consists largely of entertaining distinguished foreign visitors to the city. His term lasts a year. In the old days when the king needed funds he had to ride to Temple Bar and receive the permission of the lord mayor before he could enter the city. The mayor offered his huge sword, which the king touched in recognition of the mayor's rights. This part of the ceremony is even observed today.

Much of the medieval character of the lord mayor's office is still retained. One adjunct, however, the "lord mayor's fool" has disappeared.

STORIES from the BIG CITIES



Fellow Passenger Grew Curious; Boy Made Dime



HE'S SOME' BABY — DON'T YOU THINK ?

NEW YORK.—The small urchin climbed up the car steps and wormed himself into a seat beside the Busybody. The basket he was carrying the youngster fixed carefully between his feet, with several anxious glances in the process.

"What have you in that basket, my boy?" asked the neighbor, bending over confidentially. "I noticed how careful you were of it. It must be something quite valuable, isn't it?"

"Ye're hep, old sport. It's somethin' that's worth a whole heap."

"Well, won't you tell me what it is?"

"Not on yer life! Think I wont to get pinched?"

This was too much for the Busybody. His curiosity, heretofore merely casual, grew suddenly pointed, and he bit.

"Well, sonny, I've a notion that if I gave you a nickel you'd tell me what you hod in that basket."

"Make it a dime and I'll do it!" whispered the boy. "Only ye've got to promise not to give me away to de cop."

"Why, of course I'll promise."

The boy pocketed the coin. "Well, sport, dey's a baby in dere. I hooked 'im, an' put 'im inside when dey wasn't nobody lookin'. Now I'll get a reword for returnin' 'im."

"Well, lift up the cover and let me see how it looks."

"Hol' on, o' top. You promised not to give me away."

"Yes, but I didn't expect—" and he lifted the cover and glanced at what was underneath. Sitting up on an old cloth was an insignificant looking yellow puppy.

The boy jumped up and grinned. "Well, here's where I get off. Thanks for de dime. An' sey, I'll tell ye one ten times as good as that for a quarter. So long!"

Alarm Clocks Trap a Robber; Cause Conviction

CHICAGO.—One alarm clock caused the arrest of Paul Newman the other day and another his conviction and sentence to a year in the Bridewell.

The restaurant of A. Covillo, 620 West Madison street, had been robbed, and Detectives Sullivan and O'Brien had been detailed to find the thief. As a clew in their quest, the detectives wrote a list of the articles stolen and they included two alarm clocks.

Several hours after they had started on their thief hunt the detectives approached Halsted and West Madison streets. Suddenly they heard a long-drawn out but muffled sound.

"Ding-a-ling-a-ling,"—it started and continued for two minutes.

Newman, who was standing on the corner, began to run when the alarm went off. The detectives ran, too, right after him.

"There's our man," said Sullivan.

"Right," said O'Brien a few seconds later when they had overtaken Newman and found the ringing alarm clock in his pocket.

Later in the morning Newman was arraigned before Municipal Judge Caverly. He evidently was considering a plea of "not guilty," despite the finding of the clock in his pocket, when there was a disturbance in the courtroom.

"Ding-a-ling-a-ling," and so on it went.

It was the second stolen clock. Newman looked perplexed, then downcast. He knew pleas of innocence would avail him nothing, so he stepped up and received his sentence.

"One year in the bridewell and a fine of $10 and costs," said the judge.

Next time when Newman takes clocks he will probably stop to see whether the alarms are wound.

Knitting Pastime of the Sixth City's Firemen

DEAR ME — I'LL NEVER GET THIS KNITTING DONE
R-R-R
FIRE DEPT
WH

"Dear me, there must be a fire somewhere, and just when I had these wristlets almost finished," exclaimed Austin Reddy, six foot and stalwort fireman, laying aside his knitting with an air of petulance and climbing into a rubber coat. Reddy has the reputation of being one of the most agile scrappers in the department.

Several other firemen laid aside shawls which they were knitting, supplanting the needles with axes as they got aboard for the run. All of which is not a joke. The firemen of Cleveland have the knitting craze, and instead of the hitherto customary book, checker, domino or card game, they while the time away making shawls, coverlets and other dainty, filmy, creamy nothings for their wives, mothers or sweethearts.

Jake Abel, prominent member of the Sisters' club at No. 2, introduced the fad in Cleveland. He had read of firefighters in some western city taking up knitting as a pastime. So he got needles and yarn and learned all the intricate digital calisthenics necessary for knitting. One day he took his place at the station with a frame on which was a partly knitted shawl of an exquisite baby blue hue.

California Governor's Son Has "The Wallop"

SAN FRANCISCO.—"Jack" Johnson, as Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., son of the governor, is popularly known, took easy honors in a fistic encounter the other day with a husky youngster from Monterey in the wine room of the St. Francis hotel. Only one blow was delivered, straight from the shoulder, and James Reed was stretched on the floor, after which he was ejected from the hotel.

According to the onlookers, Reed walked into the hotel bar a little the worse for wear. Johnson's perfectly fitting checked suit and a red rose in the lapel of his coat caught Reed's roving eye. His remarks, addressed to Johnson in an undertone, were not complimentary either to the governor's son nor to his apparel. The fact that young Johnson was drinking seltzer also annoyed Reed.

"If I were you," said Johnson, quietly, "I would hesitate to make such remarks."

Thereupon Reed aimed a vicious kick, which struck Johnson just above his knee. The latter retaliated with a powerful blow, delivered by a muscular and trained arm. Reed, who is the larger man, was knocked completely out and it took several minutes of vigorous fanning and the application of wet towels to bring him back to consciousness. He staggered to his feet, was handed his hat by a bellboy and escorted to the door, with a polite invitation to forget to return.

Johnson was congratulated by his friends on the way he held his temper, on the strength of his right arm and on the nobby appearance of his checked suit.

SUSPENDERS.

Society has frowned on the masculine suspenders. So the suspender must go—has gone almost, say those who sell wearing apparel for men. It's the age of the belt. Manly shoulders must be unhampered by straps; only the patient diaphragm is to be subjected to a harness. So passes another useful device, sacrificed to fastidiousness. We used to eat mashed potato with a knife till someone with supercilious manners came along and told us the fork was the proper utensil for that important duty. Formerly people poured out their hot coffee into saucers, "blew" it cold and then drank it from saucers, all unconscious of the terrible impropriety involved. Nor was it formerly considered an indication of boorish origin for one to sip tea from a spoon. Oh, these changing times! Suspenders gone the way of the bicycle and the crocheted necktie! Is no one bold enough to do them reverence? Fashion is a tyrant. It takes no cognizance of man's various shapes—his embonpoint, his fullness or deficiency of girth—it merely issues a flat and expects all to obey. The time is opportune for a new declaration of independence. Let every man who prefers suspenders to a belt buy a pair forthwith and wear it in defiance of the world.

Some people are determined not to let Christopher Columbus rest in peace. Not long ago a celebrated Jewish rabbi insisted that the great explorer was a Jew, and now comes a member of the Royal Geographical society with the claim that Columbus was a Spaniard and not an Italian. The Spanish scientist says that the veil of mystery that has for four centuries enshrouded the cradle of Columbus has at last been torn aside to reveal him without doubt or argument as a Spaniard. Dr. Horta says that the Italian lineage of the discoverer was accepted because there was no "authentic, respectable and authorized historic documents" to prove to the contrary. On the other hand, the Spanish historian says the only accepted proof of the Italian birth of Columbus was his own statement that he was born in Genoa.

An Englishman in Shanghai was twitting the eldest son of Dr. Sun Yatsen about his father's cosmopolitanism. "Nobody knows for certain where your father was born," he said. "Canton claims him and so does Honolulu. Before the revolution he had not been here in China for many years. The English port of Hongkong was the nearest he ever approached. I don't see how your father can call himself a Chinaman, and in fact, I don't know what to call him." "Part of what you say is true," answered the son of the famous patriot. "For fifteen years my father was a man without a country, but now," and the boy smiled proudly, "a country has been made for him."

Ireland is to send a deputation to this country to protest against the landing at Queenstown of certain mentally defective persons alleged to be Irish and having Irish names, but declared to be from other countries of origin than Ireland. These objectionables are excluded from the United States as undesirable immigrants. It is said they have no claim on Ireland. Certainly they have no claim on the United States.

The mines department of Canada is preparing an official announcement that the effective smelting of Canadian ores is a commercial possibility. The iron business has undergone a revolution every few years for more than a century. Is another due? Will it result in the general adoption of electric smelting?

"ORGANIZE"—TREFZ

SECRETARY OF UNITED STATES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE TOURS MINNESOTA.

AN ADDRESS AT WINONA.

The Secretary Says Business Men Will Demand Time to Adjust Business to New Tariff Schedules.

Winona.—Edward Trefz, field secretary of the United States Chamber of Commerce, was in Winona, and brought an encouraging message to a large company of business and professional men. He emphasized the need for business men to organize to protect their common interests, and showed how a central organization at Washington would be a great asset to local organizations throughout the country in collecting and receiving data that would be for the common good. He said it was time business men woke up and took a hand in the political game, and they were beginning to do so.

Mentions Tariff.

Concerning the tariff bill, which the democratic congress may be expected to pass, he said business interests all over the country undoubtedly would insist that when the bill was passed it contain a clause that the new tariffs should not become effective for six months, thus affording business men an opportunity to prepare for any changes that might come, and not to be adversely affected by the new measure unnecessarily.

He argued for the upbuilding of a United States merchant marine to the end that foreign trade of this country might be benefited, and a greater market be built up for United States goods abroad. The United States, he said, was being outstripped by foreign countries in this respect, and it was time the people were waking up to the fact.

PLANT NOT BOUGHT.

Duluth Municipal Ownership Plan May Await Inauguration of New Commission.

Duluth.—Municipal ownership of the electric light plant, for which the voters authorized the issuance of bonds, will likely be allowed to rest until the commission takes over the reins of the city government. Since last July the city has taken no steps to acquire the plant. The last resolution passed by the council provided that three appraisers should be appointed to estimate the value of the tangible property of the Duluth Edison Electric company. The committee has never been appointed and the matter has been allowed to go without attention for several months.

The new commission, it is expected, will take it up as soon as it has been organized and disposed of the preliminary business which will undoubtedly be demanding attention.

The Duluth Edison company submitted a new contract with a material reduction of rates, but the contract has not been closed. The public has been paying for electric light at the same rate that was specified in the expired contract. It has been remarked on several occasions that a large sum could have been saved to the public had the council approved the new contract pending the negotiations.

Masonic Rally at Owatonna.

Owatonna.—A noteworthy event in Masonic circles was the conclave held in Owatonna of the joint commanderies of the Owatonna, Austin, Faribault and Albert Lea Knights Templar. The red cross degree was conferred by the Owatonna lodge, after which a banquet was served by the women of the Universalist church. Grand Prelate Pinkham, of St. Paul, and Grand Commander Snow, of Wadena, assisted in conferring the degrees. The total deposits in the banks of this county, seven in number, aggregate $3,000,000. A new bank has recently been opened at Medford.

Indian Payment Finished.

Cloquet. — Superintendent S. D. Cross of the Fond du Lac reservation has completed the annual payment to the Indians, 972 receiving $75 each, the amount paid out totaling $72,900. Approximately 400 of the Indians were paid at Cloquet, thus putting into circulation in this vicinity about $30,000. The Indians at Superior live in the East end and much of the funds received by them went to pay for homes.

Knights of Columbus to Meet.

Wabash.—A meeting of Knights of Columbus took place Sunday, when a large class was initiated. About thirty knights from Winona attended.

Zippel Jury Disagrees.

Bemidji.—After having been out sixty-six hours a jury in district court here, which listened to testimony in the case of Wilhelm Zippel, who sought to collect damages from the Canadian Northern, alleging that sparks from a locomotive of that road started the forest fire which swept over his farm in 1910, and destroyed the towns of Beaudette and Spooner, failed to reach an agreement. The jury was discharged, and the case is set for retrial at the Feburary term of court here.

TO DISCARD PLANT.

Lighting System at St. Peter, One of Oldest in State, Breaks Down.

St. Peter.—Boiler trouble at the municipal lighting plant has necessitated closing down the station, and current is being secured from the Consumers Power Company of Mankato. As a result of the break-down, there is talk of discarding the municipally-owned station, and entering into contract with the company.

St. Peter's municipal plant is one of the first established in Minnesota, and the system, particularly the street lighting system, is of a type now obsolete. There has been much deterioration, both at the plant and on the pole line, and the city faces the necessity of making a heavy expenditure for its replacement.

Some weeks ago one of the boilers burned out, and although repairs have been made it is impossible to operate the plant with this boiler. Yesterday the second boiler went out of commission and the plant was closed. Bids on a new boiler have been called for, but it is not likely the aldermen will take action until they learn the sentiment of the taxpayers. This probably will be shown at a public meeting Tuesday night, when representatives of the Consumers Power Company will submit a proposition to furnish current for light and power purposes.

It is expected the company will offer to supply electricity at a trifle more than switchboard cost, which would relieve St. Peter of the cost of plant maintenance. Recently the aldermen have obtained estimates of the probable cost of replacing the street lighting system with new type magnetite arcs. This item is placed at $4,000, but is considered justifiable by the fact that experts rate the plant's antiquated pole line at less than 50 per cent efficiency.

A new boiler will cost at least $3,000, and many business men favor using this money to replace the pole line. They would contract with Mankato for current, and use the old plant for operating the waterworks system.

TWINE PLANT MOVED.

Fifty More Convicts Transferred from Penitentiary to Other Quarters.

Stillwater. — Early Monday about fifty convicts of the Minnesota state penitentiary were loaded on an auto truck and conveyed to the new prison. None of them were manacled or chained, Warden Wolfer declaring this procedure unnecessary. With their arrival the population of the new prison increased to 200, while there are 650 prisoners remaining in the old penitentiary.

With the season ended for the manufacture of binding twine the machinery of the twine plant is being transferred to the new prison, the moving being expected to be completed within the ensuing week. The new cellhouse is rapidly nearing completion and in the course of a few months the industries of the old prison will be transferred to the new.

Several changes have been made at the prison. Robert Coles, deputy warden at the old prison, will be the deputy at the new. Jonas Buckland, acting deputy warden at the new prison, becomes assistant acting deputy warden there; John Sullivan, assistant deputy warden at the old prison, will be acting deputy warden there, and John Whalen, cellroom keeper at the old prison, will be assistant deputy warden at the new.

CAPT. R. L. GORMAN DIES.

Gettysburg Survivor and Son of Minnesota's Second Territorial Governor.

St. Paul.—Captain Richard L. Gorman, son of the second territorial governor of Minnesota, and a survivor of the First Minnesota's immortal charge of Gettysburg, died at the city hospital after an illness of only a few days. He was chief clerk in the St. Paul board of public works, and had been identified with the department for more than thirty years. He was born March 28, 1837, in Bloomington, Ind., and came to St. Paul in 1854 with his father, General Willis A. Gorman, when the latter was made territorial governor of Minnesota.

When the First Minnesota was mustered in, Governor Gorman was made its colonel, and his son went in as a lieutenant, later being promoted to captain. He served through the war. He was married in 1863 to Miss Cleo Irvine of St. Paul, who died six years ago. He leaves a daughter, Mrs. Robert H. Fisher of St. Paul, and a sister, Mrs. M. B. Wood of Brooklyn. Former Mayor Robert A. Smith is a cousin and Dr. D. C. Jones, coroner, a nephew.

Holstein Cattle for Farmers.

Graceville.—A. R. Lathrop, county agricultural agent for Big Stone county, has just completed arrangements for a public sale of registered and high grade Holstein cattle.

Stowe, Centenarian, Dead.

Northfield.—Joseph Stowe, 101 years old, who built the first house in Northfield, died at his farm near this city, Sunday. He was born in Vermont, on April 14, 1811, and came here at a very early date—just how early it is impossible to say, as the family records are meager. He first worked as a carpenter. His wife has been dead many years, and he and his son have been living alone on the old place. He was rugged and active, and never had a sick day.

ANOTHER ELECTION LAW.

Minnesota Representative Declares Primary Has Failed in Its Purpose.

Rochester.—A new election law, one that is different from any in any state in the Union, having for its main object the elimination of the objectionable features of a primary, the shortening of the ballot and the saving of money to the state, may be introduced at the next session of the legislature, by Representative Kerry E. Conley, Olmsted county.

Mr. Conley would embody in his measure the elimination of one election by holding the primary and general elections as one.

The main feature of his proposed bill is the elimination of the primary entirely and the re-establishment of the party convention to nominate state officers. Instead of the party [illegible], he proposes electing electors by the voters of each district. The best possible method of doing this, Mr. Conley says, is to have party electors placed on the ballots of the spring, township and municipal elections.

E. F. COMSTOCK DEAD.

Served as State Senator, Representative, Alderman and on Commissions.

Minneapolis.—Edgar F. Comstock, who was at different times senator, member of the courthouse and city hall commission, alderman and park commissioner, is dead at his home here, after an illness of a year. Mr. Comstock had been in public life and allied with public improvement enterprises in Minneapolis for more than forty years.

Mr. Comstock was born March 4, 1845, in Passadumkeag, Me., and was educated in the common schools. In 1862 he enlisted in the First Maine cavalry, was honorably discharged because of disability, but enlisted again as a private in the Seventeenth infantry, serving until the close of the war. He was married to Mary Hacking of Greenbush, Me., and in 1870 moved to Minneapolis, where he entered the lumber business and gained a competency, retiring from active business before beginning his political career.

Sunday Amusements Opposed.

Fergus Falls.—A determined effort is being made by church people to close the theaters on Sundays. Petitions were circulated in the churches Sunday, and an ordinance was introduced by Alderman Lamson at the council meeting Monday evening, providing that all places of amusement, including skating rinks, should close on Sundays. A large delegation of women attended the council meeting with the petitions, and made vigorous pleas for the adoption of the ordinance. When they had finished and were about to leave the hall, Mayor E. T. Nelson called them back, and advised them to work with the aldermen exclusively, saying they might "wilt," but as for himself, he wanted to say that when the ordinance reached him for signature, it was not going to be signed, as he believed everyone should have the right to attend a theater on any day they wished.

Station on State Line.

Ortonville.—A meeting of the city councils of Ortonville and Big Stone City was held with the state railway and warehouse commission here for the purpose of discussing the location of the proposed union station for the two cities. The citizens of both towns were unanimously in favor of building on the state line. The main object of the meeting was to discuss the rate question, which it was thought might be changed if the station were erected on the state line, but Superintendent J. T. Gillick, of the Milwaukee Railway Company, stated that the company would be obliged to call each town separately and erect signs on each end of the station, thereby eliminating any dispute as to the interstate question.

H. F. Brown Dead.

Minneapolis.—Henry F. Brown, former pioneer Minneapolis lumberman, for fifty years one of the country's leading breeders of fine cattle and owner of valuable ore property in Minnesota, is dead at his home here. Mr. Brown had been in ill health two years. He was 75 years old. For thirty-six years Mr. Brown was one of the largest individual operators in lumber in the northwest. When he disposed of his business in 1896 he was regarded as one of the northwest's leading figures of the industry.

Husband Ex-Convict.

Minneapolis.—The pretty veil of romance torn from her eyes, Mrs. Walter Wesley Williams, formerly Miss Marcia Jennings of Kansas City, is at the home of relatives in Minneapolis suffering a nervous breakdown from the shock of discovering that the man she married but a month ago was an ex-convict and get-rich-quick worker of the shrewdest type.

Missing Man Alive.

Mankato.—Sheriff Osten has word from the marshal of Lewisville that Mrs. Fred Meyer has received a post-card in her husband's handwriting, sent from New Ulm, saying he was feeling fine. The marshal later reported having heard from Lake Crystal and that Meyer was there. A brother has gone to investigate. William Schram has been given his freedom. He had been held because he was the last man with Meyer before the latter's disappearance.

DENIES MONEY TRUST

ALL THE BANKS IN CHRISTENDOM COULD NOT FORM COMBINE SAYS J. P. MORGAN.

FAVORS COMBINATIONS.

Financier Disclaims Knowledge That He Wields Vast Power—Seeks No Such Position in Finance.

Washington, J. Pierpont Morgan told the money trust investigation committee of the house that "all the money in christendom and all the banks in christendom" could not form a monopoly. Mr. Morgan disclaimed any knowledge that he wielded a vast power in modern finance, and declared emphatically that he sought no such power.

For nearly five hours the chief witness, called by the committee in its probe of the intricacies of modern finance, stood a running fire of questions that covered every phase of financial operation.

Remarkable Hearing.

In some respects it was one of the most remarkable hearings about the halls of congress in recent years, with Mr. Morgan as the type and embodiment of financial operations on a colossal scale, and the committee's counsel, Samuel Untermyer, the representative element which seeks to probe to the innermost recesses the conditions under which vast financial operations are conducted.

Prefers "Combination."

Mr. Morgan gave at length his views on competition, combination cooperation and control in industry and finance, particularly the latter. He declared that he "did not mind competition," but that he preferred "combination" in his operations. He was emphatic in his declaration that "there is no way one man can get a monopoly of money."

Throughout the long examination to which Mr. Morgan submitted with an evident willingness to answer, there was not a moment when interest lagged. Short, sharp questions and answers came with striking rapidity.

While the colloquys were at times emphatic there was no serious clash between Mr. Morgan and Mr. Untermyer.

Mr. Morgan gave a ready response to questions, although there was often a battle of wits as to the meaning and effect of various financial conditions and operations.

The question of competition and combination brought about a lively interchange between the noted financier and Mr. Untermyer, the latter opening the tilt with the suggestion that Mr. Morgan was opposed to competition.

The witness denied this, but said that he "favored co-operation," adding that he was in no way opposed to competition and in fact "liked a little competition."

Disagrees With Untermyer.

He disagreed with the views of Mr. Untermyer on the question of interlocking directorates, which form the basis for a large part of the statistical evidence that makes up the record of the money trust investigation up to date. Without actual control, Mr. Morgan claimed, there is no control, although some directors may be common to several corporations.

Thousands to Fight Plague.

New York, The sale of Red Cross Christmas seals throughout the United States this season will bring between $400,000 and $500,000 to aid in the fight against tuberculosis, according to reports received here from all over the United States by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis. More than 100,000,000 seals have been distributed for the campaign among 100,000 agents.

Captain of Slocum Pardoned.

Washington, Bent with his four score of years, to which was added the stigma of a ten-year sentence in Sing Sing, Captain William M. Van Schaick, master of the excursion steamer General Slocum, upon which 1,030 men, women and children were burned to death and drowned June 15, 1904, was granted a full pardon by President Taft. The pardon is effective December 25, and is one of the president's first Christmas presents. Van Schaick has been out on parole.

CANADA WEEK IN CHICAGO

CANADIAN EXHIBITS AT LIVE STOCK AND LAND SHOWS CENTER OF ATTRACTION.

The hats were doffed to Canada during the two weeks of the Land Show and the week of the Live Stock Show at Chicago. Willing to display its goods, anxious to let the people of the central states know what could be produced on Canadian farm lands, and the quality of the article, Hon. Dr. Roche, minister of the interior of Canada, directed that sufficient space be secured at the United States Land Show, recently held, to give some adequate idea of the field resources of western Canada. Those in charge had splendid location, and installed one of the most attractive grain and grass exhibits ever seen anywhere. Thousands, anxious to get "back to the land," saw the exhibit, saw wheat that weighed 68 pounds to the measured bushel, oats that went 48 and barley that tipped the scales at 55 pounds. The clover, the alfalfa, the wild pea vine and vetch, the rye grass, the red-top and many other succulent and nutritious varieties of wild grasses demanded and deserved from their prominence and quality the attention they received. The grain in the straw, bright in color, and carrying heads that gave evidence of the truth of the statements of Mr. W. J. White of Ottawa, and his attendants, that the wheat would average 28 to 35 bushels and over per acre, the oats 55 to 105 bushels, the flax 12 to 28 bushels, were strongly in evidence, and arranged with artistic taste on the walls. The vegetable exhibit was a surprise to the visitors. Potatoes, turnips, cabbage—in fact, all of it proved that not only in grains was western Canada prominent, but in vegetables it could successfully compete with the world.

One of the unique and successful features of the exhibit was the successful and systematic daily distribution of bread made from Canadian flour. It was a treat to those who got it. Canadian butter, Canadian cheese and Canadian honey helped to complete an exhibit that revealed in a splendid way the great resources of a country in which so many Americans have made their home.

A feature of the exhibit was the placards, announcing the several recent successes of Canadian farm produce and live stock in strong competition with exhibits from other countries. There was posted the Seager Wheeler championship prize for Marquis wheat grown at Rosthern in 1911, beating the world. Then I. Holmes of Cardston entered the competitive field at Lethbridge Dry Farming Congress, and won the wheat championship of 1912, beating Mr. Wheeler with the same variety of wheat. Hill & Sons of Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, in 1911, won the Colorado silver trophy for best oats grown, competed for in a big competition at Columbus, Ohio, in 1911. The produce of British Columbia at the New York Land Show in 1911 carried off the world's championship for potatoes, and incidentally won a $1,000 silver trophy, and then, but a few days ago, the same province carried off the world's prize for apples at the Horticultural Show in London, England.

But that was not all. These Canadians, who had the temerity to state that corn was not the only feed for finishing high-grade beef cattle, entered for the fat steer championship at the Live Stock Show in Chicago a polled Angus—"Glencarnock Victor." Nearly 300 entries were in the field. "Glencarnock Victor" didn't know a kernel of corn from a Brazilian walnut. There were Iowa, Illinois, Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, Wisconsin and their corn-fed article, determined to win, bound to beat this black animal from the north, and his "nothing but prairie grass, oats and barley feed," as his owner proudly stated, but they didn't. Canada and McGregor & Sons, with their "Glencarnock Victor," won, and today the swelldom of America is eating of his steaks and roasts—the champion steer of the world.

But once more the herd of cattle that won the Sweepstakes at the same show was bred and owned by the owners of "Glencarnock Victor," fed only on prairie grass, oats and barley, near Brandon, Manitoba. The royal reception given to Mr. McGregor on his return to his home town was well deserved.

Omission must not be made of the wonderful and beautiful display of apples made by British Columbia, occupying a full half section of the great Land Show. This was in personal charge of Mr. W. E. Scott, deputy minister of agriculture for that province, who was not only a host to those who visited the exhibit, but was also an encyclopedia of information regarding the resources of that country. With 200,000 Americans going to western Canada this year, it is pleasing to know that so many from this side of the line can participate in the honors coming to that new country.—Advertisement.

FIXING RATES UNDER PARCEL POST SYSTEM

Government Goes Into Business of Transmitting Merchandise Through the Mails.

NEW LAW FULLY EXPLAINED

Country Divided Into Zones and Units for Purpose of Fixing Charges for Carriage—No Package Weighing More Than Eleven Pounds Is Mailable—Anything Properly Wrapped Which Will Not Injure Other Mail May Be Sent.

By EDWARD S. CLARK.

With the coming of the New Year the United States government will enter into a new field of enterprise—the transmittal of merchandise by what is known as the parcel post. For years there has been a demand for such a system of inexpensive transmittal of packages. The camps of favor and disfavor of the parcel post scheme have been about equally divided. Finally at the last session of congress a bill was passed which will put the plan into operation, but only it must be said in little more than an experimental way.

It is the intention of Uncle Sam to move rather slowly in the parcel post matter. He wants to find how popular it will be, how much it will cost the government, and whether there is to be a profit or loss at the end of each year. If it is found that the plan is successful from the point of view of the people, which means the government also, the parcel post will be extended until finally it reaches the proportions which its proponents say they believe it is destined to assume.

Zone System Explained.

It is no exaggeration to say that thousands upon thousands of inquiries have been made of the postmaster general as to just what the parcel post will mean to the people. It was the law of congress establishing the system which made provision for a division of the country into zones and into 35,000 units which are to be used as centers in describing the circles which mark the boundaries of the zones. There has been no clear understanding, apparently, of this zone system, but really it is a very simple matter.

The accompanying map shows the country divided into zones from the unit in which Washington is situated, as the center. Accompanying the map is a table showing the rate of postage per pound for parcels from Washington to places within all the zones.

Each unit contains an area thirty miles square. Now each unit is a center from which the zones are drawn and so every unit in the country no matter where it is situated will have zones drawn from it just exactly as Washington has them drawn from it. For instance, take Keokuk, Ia., which is in a unit in the fifth zone. From that will be drawn circles exactly as they are drawn from Washington and they will be numbered from Keokuk as number one, just as they are numbered from Washington as number one. Of course, however, Zone Six will have a different geographical position as related to Keokuk than it has as related to Washington, but as the radius of the circles drawn from Keokuk is the same length as the radius of the circles drawn from Washington, Keokuk's Zone Six will be just as far from its center as Washington's Zone Six is.

How Rates Are Fixed.

It can be seen from this readily enough that the postal rates from Washington to its particular zone will be the same as the postal rates from Keokuk to its particular zones. Each unit being about thirty miles square will of course contain in most cases a number of postoffices, but each office in the same unit is considered as being the center of the circles from which the zones are drawn. The rates of postage are fixed from the unit in which the sending postoffice is situated, but the price to every place in any zone is just the same. To illustrate, it will cost exactly the same amount to send a parcel from Washington to Erie, Pa., that it costs to send it to Atlanta, Ga., because Erie and Atlanta with reference to Washington are situated in the fourth zone. The rates therefore are fixed from the unit in which the postoffice is located, but they are the same from that office to any point in any one zone.

It will be seen by reference to the table of rates of postage that it will cost more per pound to send a package a long distance than it does to send it a short distance. The rate increases for a package weighing one pound at the rate of one cent for each zone. No package weighing more than 11 pounds can be sent under the new parcel post law. It should be said right here that on the long hauls the parcel post may not be able to compete with the express companies, but that on shorter hauls it can so compete. It was the expressed desire of the legislators and of the postoffice officials that the parcel post system should be made of particular use to persons having farm and factory products to transmit to customers. It is probable that producers must study the rates of postage and the convenience of transmittal and compare them with the cost and convenience under present methods before individually a man can determine whether he is to profit or not by the change. Then there is another thing to be considered and which only can be known definitely when fuller regulations have been made to specify exactly what kind of things can be sent by parcel post. It can be said in a general way that anything can be sent which is properly wrapped and which will not injure other mail matter with which it may come in contact.

Copy Foreign Countries.

It is probable that the government will adopt a means of transportation for certain kinds of its merchandise much like those which have been adopted in parcel post countries abroad. What the English call hampers, basket-like arrangements, probably will be adopted, and as these can be kept separate from the ordinary mail matter it is believed that the regulations as finally adopted will allow the sending of eggs, butter, dressed poultry, live poultry, honey, fruit, and other products of the country.

The 11-pound limit for a single package may work at first against any very extended use of the parcel post for some of the articles which have been named. Of course, more weight can be sent if it is sent in different parcels, but the cost in that case would be heavier because the increase per pound on a single package is not great up to 11 pounds, and probably it would increase at no greater rate if the government were to raise the limit of weight which is now fixed. To make it simpler, it will cost more to send two packages of 11 pounds than it would to send one package of 22 pounds if the government eventually should allow a heavier single package to be carried and should charge in proportion just what it does now for one package of 11 pounds weight.

Every postmaster in the United States will have a parcel post map like the one which is here reproduced except that the zone lines will be shown with the unit of his postoffice as a center. All that a postmaster will have to do when a parcel is presented for transportation is to find out in what zone the destination of the package lies. His table will show him instantly the rate per pound from the unit in which his postoffice lies to the zone of the package's destination, the price as has been explained before, to every postoffice in any one zone being the same. The parcel post will take nothing but fourth-class matter. Printed matter is still in the third-class designation. Therefore books cannot be sent by the parcel post system. This the postoffice authorities seem to think is in a way unjust and may work a hardship. It may be that in the future the law will be changed so as to include all printed matter. It seems to be certain that an attempt will be made to bring about this change as speedily as possible.

Must Bear Stamp.

Postmaster General Hitchcock has ordered that postmasters be advised that parcel post packages cannot be accepted for mailing unless they bear a distinctive parcel post stamp and have attached to them the return card of the sender. A series of distinctive stamps is now in course of preparation for this class of mail as required by the law creating the parcel post system. Consignments of these stamps will be ready for shipment to all postoffices in ample time for the establishment of the new system on New Year's day.

The postoffice department has given instruction to every postmaster in the country to enlighten his patrons as much as possible on the general subject of the parcel post and especially on the use of the special stamps and the necessary attachment of the return card. The law requires that all fourth-class matter mailed after January 1, 1913, without parcel post stamps attached shall be treated as "Held for postage" matter. Parcel post packages will be mailable only at postoffices, branch postoffices, lettered and local named stations, and such numbered stations as may be designated by the postmasters.

It has been announced by Postmaster General Hitchcock that nearly 70,000 scales will be required for use in the parcel post system which is to go into effect January 1st. He has accordingly authorized the issuance of bids for that number. Two hundred of the largest postoffices and their branches will be supplied with automatic springless scales. The next class of offices, numbering about 10,000, will be given high grade beam scale, while the four class offices, numbering about 55,000, will be furnished with the best spring balances obtainable, each having a capacity for twenty pounds. These scales will be used by postmasters to determine the amount of postage required on parcel post packages. The fact that many of the postoffices of the country are now furnished with scales of a limited capacity makes it necessary for the postmaster general to make this very large purchase of scales capable of taking care of the parcel post business. It is understood that this will be the largest single order ever placed for scales.

Rate on Seeds Not Affected.

It should be said that the act of congress which puts a parcel post plan into operation does not in any way affect the postage rate on seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions and plants as fixed by section 482 of the postal laws and regulations.

The classification of articles mailable as well as the weight limit, the rates of postage, zone or zones and other conditions of mailability under the act of congress, if the postmaster general shall find on experience "that they or any of them are such as to prevent the shipment of articles desirable, or shall permanently render the cost of the service greater than the receipts of the revenue therefrom, he is hereby authorized, subject to the consent of the interstate commerce commission after investigation, to reform from time to time such classification, weight limit, rates, zone or zones or conditions, in order to promote the service to the public or to insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof."

Through many years different members of the house and senate have been interested in promoting parcel post legislation. Among the men most active in securing the legislation which soon is to go into effect as law are Senator Jonathan Bourne of Oregon, Representatives David J. Lewis of Maryland and William Sulzer of New York, who has just been elected governor of that state.

To ascertain conditions surrounding the establishment of the parcel post system in places differing widely in size, climate and industries, Postmaster General Hitchcock recently summoned to Washington, to confer with the special parcel post committee, the postmasters of five typical offices. They are William H. Davis, Pittsburg, Pa.; Daniel T. Gerow, Jacksonville, Fla.; M. H. Joster, Wilmington, Del.; E. M. C. Quimby, Suffolk, Va., and Henry N. Bradley, Charlestown, W. Va.

Confer With Postmasters.

The postmasters of the five largest offices in the country have already appeared before the committee, so Pittsburg was represented as being a large first class office, though smaller than any of the greater five, and as being the center of a tremendous manufacturing area. The postmaster of Pittsburg reported that the board of trade of that city has a special parcel post committee, working toward bringing the consumer and producer nearer to each other by the new system. He also said that many of the merchants are planning to have their city deliveries made by parcel post.

Wilmington, Del., represented a large farming and manufacturing district, with its mail connections close with Philadelphia, one of the largest offices. Jacksonville is the largest office in Florida, and the outlet for all the mail of the state. It is peculiar in having a special increase of force in winter, the tourist season, and the postmaster said that it was expected that travelers would use the parcel post extensively in sending home five and ten-pound packages of fruit.

Suffolk, Va., and Charlestown, W. Va., are both very small second class offices, one in the tide-water district, with large truck interests; the other far inland in an orchard country, with diversified farm products. The postmasters of both offices reported great interest in the parcel post, and said that they had continual inquiries regarding its scope.

From these postmasters the committee was able to glean a great amount of valuable information, which, added to that gained from the recent hearings in Maryland, puts it in a position to plan the details of the service to the greatest advantage of the producing farmer.

RATES OF POSTAGE

Parcels weighing four ounces or less are mailable at the rate of one cent for each ounce or fraction of an ounce, regardless of distance. Parcels weighing more than four ounces are mailable at the pound rate, as shown by the following table, and when mailed at this rate any fraction of a pound is considered a full pound.

Wt. Lbs.	*1st zone Local rate.	*1st zone Zone rate.	2d zone rate.	3d zone rate.	4th zone rate	5th zone rate	6th zone rate	7th zone rate	8th zone rate

APPROVES RULES FOR PARCEL POST

Postmaster General Issues Regulations Governing System.

WHAT MAY BE SENT BY MAIL

Gives American People Opportunity to Send Farm and Factory Products by Mail From and to Any Point in United States.

Postmaster General Hitchcock has just approved the regulations which cover in detail the articles which may or may not be sent by parcel post. These regulations are now being turned off at the government printing office on a "rush order" and they will be distributed as rapidly as possible.

The rules as to what can be sent and what cannot be sent and the instructions for the preparation of mailable articles with other "official advice" are given here as they have just been prepared by the postoffice department in Washington.

The minimum rate will be five cents for the first pound and three cents for each additional pound to any point not exceeding fifty miles from the office of mailing; the local rate, which is five cents for the first pound and one cent for additional pound, applies to all parcels the delivery of which does not involve their transportation on railway lines. The rates increase for each successive one of the eight zones, the maximum rate being twelve cents a pound, which will carry a parcel across the continent or to any of our possessions. Parcels will be limited to eleven pounds in weight and six feet in length and girth combined.

Mailable Perishable Articles.

Butter, lard and perishable articles such as fish, fresh meats, dressed fowls, vegetables, fruits, berries and articles of a similar nature that decay quickly, when so packed or wrapped as to prevent damage to other mail matter, will be accepted for local delivery either at the office of mailing or on any rural route starting therefrom. When inclosed in an inner cover and a strong outer cover of wood, metal, heavy corrugated pasteboard or other suitable material and wrapped so that nothing can escape from the package, they will be accepted for mailing to any offices within the first zone or within a radius of 50 miles. Butter, lard, or any greasy or oily substance intended for delivery at offices beyond the first zone must be suitably packed. Vegetables and fruit that do not decay quickly will be accepted for mailing to any zone if packed so as to prevent damage to other mail matter. Eggs will be accepted for local delivery when securely packed in a basket or other container. Eggs will be accepted for mailing regardless of distance when each egg is wrapped separately and packed in a container.

There is no restriction on salted, dried, smoked or cured meats and other meat products, but fresh meat in any form will be transported only within the first zone.

Parcels containing perishable articles must be marked "PERISHABLE," and articles likely to spoil within the time reasonably required for transportation and delivery will not be accepted for mailing.

Manufactured Articles.

Manufacturers or dealers intending to transmit articles in considerable quantities are asked to submit to the postmaster for approval a specimen parcel showing the manner of packing.

When sharp pointed instruments are offered for mailing, the points must be capped or encased. Blades must be bound so that they will remain attached to each other or within their handles or sockets.

In- Powders, pepper, snuff, or other similar powders not explosive, or any similar pulverized dry substance, not poisonous, may be sent when inclosed in cases made of metal, wood or other material to render impossible the escape of any of the contents. Flour of all kinds must be put up in such manner as to prevent the package breaking or the flour being scattered in the mails.

Queen Bees and Nursery Stock.

Queen bees, live insects, and dried reptiles may be mailed in accordance with the regulations that now apply to other classes of mail.

Seeds of fruit, nursery stock, and all other plant products for preparation may be mailed under the same conditions.

Confectionery and Soap.

Candles, confectionery, yeast cakes, soap in hard cakes, etc., must be inclosed in boxes and so wrapped as to prevent injury to other mail matter.

Sealed original packages of proprietary articles, such as soaps, tobacco, pills, tablets, etc., put up in fixed quantities by the manufacturer, and not in themselves unmailable, will be accepted for mailing when properly wrapped.

Millinery.

Fragile articles, such as millinery, toys, musical instruments, etc., and articles consisting wholly or in part of glass, or contained in glass, must be securely packed and the parcel stamped or labeled "FRAGILE."

Unmailable Matter.

The following matter is declared unmailable by law:

Matter manifestly obscene, lewd, or lascivious; articles intended for preventing conception; articles intended for indecent or immoral purposes; all matter otherwise mailable by law, the outside cover or wrapper of which bears any delineation or language of a libelous, scurrilous, defamatory, or threatening character. All such matter, when deposited in a post office or found in the mails, shall be withdrawn and sent to the divisions of dead letters.

Intoxicants, Poisons and Inflammable Materials.

Spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind; poisons of every kind, and articles and compositions containing poison, poisonous animals, insects and reptiles; explosives of every kind; inflammable materials (which are held to include matches, kerosene oil, gasolins, naphtha, benzine, turpentine, denatured alcohol, etc.), infernal machines, and mechanical, chemical or other devices or compositions which may ignite or explode; disease germs or scabs, and other natural or artificial articles, compositions or materials of whatever kind which may kill, or in any wise injure another or damage the mail or other property.

Pistols, Animals and Birds.

Pistols or revolvers, whether in detached parts or otherwise; live or dead (and not stuffed) animals, birds, or poultry, except as elsewhere provided; raw hides or pelts, guano, or any article having a bad odor will not be admitted to the mails.

Treatment of Undeliverable Parcels.

Perishable matter will be delivered as promptly as possible, but if such matter can not be delivered and becomes offensive and injurious to health, postmasters may destroy it, or the injurious or offensive portions thereof.

Undeliverable perishable matter which in its nature does not become offensive or injurious to health may be delivered by postmasters to the proper local municipal authority to be distributed to hospitals, asylums or other charitable or reformatory institutions. If there is no such municipal authority, the matter may be delivered to any charitable institution or organization making application therefor. If no application is made, the matter will be destroyed at the expiration of two weeks.

Parcels Improperly Packed.

Postmasters will refuse to receive for mailing parcels not properly indorsed or packed for safe shipment.

When parcels on which the postage is wholly unpaid or insufficiently prepaid is deposited for local delivery and the sender is unknown, notice of detention need not be sent but such matter will be delivered and the deficient postage collected from the addressee by the carrier. If the addressee refuses to pay the postage the matter will be sent to the Division of Dead Letters.

Insurance on Parcels.

A mailable parcel on which the postage is fully prepaid may be insured against loss in an amount equivalent to its actual value, but not to exceed $50, on payment of a fee of ten cents in parcel post stamps, such stamps to be affixed.

When a parcel is insured, the sender will be given a receipt showing the office and date of mailing and number of the parcel.

When a return receipt is desired by the sender of an insured parcel the postmaster at the mailing office will note the request on the margin of the insurance tag, and the postmaster at the office of address will obtain from the addressee a receipt and mail it to the sender.

The liability for indemnity shall cease when delivery has been effected.

Forwarding of Parcels.

Parcels may be remailed or forwarded on the payment of additional postage at the rate which would be chargeable if they were originally mailed at the forwarding office, in which case the necessary stamps will be affixed by the forwarding postmaster. Payment must be made every time the parcel is forwarded.

Preparation for Mailing.

Parcels must be prepared for mailing in such manner that the contents can be easily examined. A parcel will not be accepted for mailing unless it bears the name and address of the sender preceded by the word "From."

In addition to the name and address of the sender, which is required, it will be permissible to write or print on the covering of a parcel, or on a tag or label attached to it, the occupation of the sender, and to indicate in a small space by means of marks, letters, numbers, names or other brief description, the character of the parcel, but ample space must be left on the address side for the full address in legible characters and for the necessary postage stamps. Inscriptions such as "Merry Christmas," "Please do not open until Christmas," "Happy New Year," "With best wishes," and the like, may be placed on the covering of the parcel in such manner as not to interfere with the address.

Distinctive Stamps.

The law requires that the postage on all matter must be prepaid by distinctive parcel post stamps affixed. Postmasters cannot receive for mailing parcels that do not bear such stamps.

Parcel post stamps are not valid for the payment of postage on matter of the first, second, and third classes, and when used for that purpose, the matter to which they are affixed shall be treated as "Held for postage."

Maps and Guides.

Parcel post maps, with accompanying guides, are to be sold to the public at their cost, 75 cents, through the chief clerk of the post office department. In ordering maps care should be taken to specify the post office from which the postage rates are to be determined.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

The long drawn out fight between George Leimers and A. B. Mandt for County Commissioner of the 5th district was settled by lot Monday, Mandt winning out. Without regard to the difference of opinion in that district we are of the opinion that they have got the best man for the position. As a man we have the highest respect for Mr. Leimers, but it began to look suspicious, when you consider the mugwamp gang, that called themselves republicans that were backing him. A man is usually rated by the company he keeps, and when you size up the gang who was supporting Leimers, from the Eleven Towns at Erie down to John Larson in Wyandotte, honest men had ought to be well satisfied that A. B. Mandt is the commissioner from that district.

ENCOURAGING FRAUD.

During the present session of Congress, a bill will be introduced by Representative Lever, of south Carolina, to change the law on oleomargarine, with a view to making a uniform tax of two cents a pound on uncolored and the same tax on colored oleo. This proposed reduction is offered in the alleged interests of the laboring men, so as to reduce the cost of living. It is an arrant fraud. The present tax of ten cents a pound on colored oleomargarine is not a tax on oleomargarine at all, it is a tax upon a swindle, because there is no object in coloring oleomargarine except to make it an imitation of butter, so that it can be sold, fraudulently, as butter. The tax ought to be increased to twenty-five cents a pound instead of being reduced. If anybody wants to buy oleomargarine, there is practically no tax upon it when it is sold as oleomargarine Let the proposed bill be entitled:

"A bill to encourage fraud and to introduce unfair competition with the dairy interests of the United States."

Then the bill can be argued up on its merits.—Northwestern Agriculturist.

A CHAT WITH OUR SUBSCRIBERS

Time flies on golden wings, and few of us realize how fast the days are passing!

Especially does this seem to be true with some of our subscribers. In sending out our statements for subscription this fall we received some queer replies. One wrote and asked us if we did not remember that he had paid up in full by check at the time he made final proof. We looked up our books and found that he made final proof one year ago last June, and had been receiving THE SUNBEAM ever since.

Another one wrote and asked us if we did not remember that he paid us a $1.00 at Highlanding. We looked up the books and found that he become a subscriber in September 1910, and in November 1910 he paid $1.00 on subscription. Now my friends and subscribers when you get a statement from this office, do not get mad about it, but just stop and count ten and try to remember when was the last time that you paid on subscription. The post office department has made a ruling that newspapers cannot be sent through the mail as second class matter to subscribers who owe more than one years subscription.

Now we must obey this rule and it is not a question as to whether your credit is good for more than a $1.00 or not, but the publishers books are looked up to see whether you have paid or not. Our collections have been very light this fall and we now hope our subscribers will remit their subscriptions and jog their account ahead one or two years.

PARCEL POST REGULATIONS

On January 1, 1913, Parcel Post will go into effect, and all patrons who send merchandise by mail, on and after the above date, should become familiar with the following features of the proposed parcel post regulations.

1. That distinctive parcel post stamps must be used on all fourth class matter beginning January 1, 1913, and that such matter bearing ordinary stamps will be treated as "Held for Postage."

2. That parcels will be mailable only post offices, branch post offices lettered and local named stations and such numbered stations as may be designed by the postmaster.

3. That all parcels must bear the return card of the sender; otherwise they will not be accepted for mailing.

4. On and after January 1, 1913, ordinary postage stamps will not be valid on fourth class matter.

Drives Off A Terror.

The chief executioner of death in the winter and spring months is pneumonia. Its advance agents are colds and grip. In any attack by one of these maladies no time should be lost in taking the best medicine obtainable to drive it off. Countless thousands have found this to be Dr. King's New Discovery." My husband believes it has kept him from having pneumonia three or four times," writes Mrs. George W. Place, Rawsonville, Vt., "and for coughs, colds and croup we have never found its equal." Guaranteed for all bronchial affections. Price 50 cts. and $1.00. Trial bottle free at All Druggists.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

The annual meeting of the Red Lake River Transportation Co. will be held at Highlanding on Monday January 13th, 1913, for the purpose of electing a board of directors and to transact any other business properly brought before said meeting. All turn out.

Could Shout For Joy.

"I want to thank you from the bottom of my heart," wrote C. B Rader, of Lewisburg, W. Va., "for the wonderful double benefit I got from Electric Bitters, in curing me of both a severe case of stomach trouble and of rheumatism, from which I had been an almost helpless sufferer for ten years. It suited my case as though made just for me." For dyspepsia, indigestion, jaundice, and to rid the system of kidney poisons that cause rheumatism, Electric Bitters have no equal. Try them. Every bottle is guaranteed to satisfy. Only 50 cents at All Druggists.

Fluctuations of the Sun.

It would appear from the researches of the astronomers that the exact shape of the sun is not known. The generally accepted idea that the sun is a sphere is, some hold, at least open to question. Practically every series of measures shows departures from a spherical form. Of course the departures, considering the great size of the great globe, are very minute. There seems to be a fluctuation in the shape of the sun corresponding in period with the sun spot cycle. There are also [illegible] of about twenty-eight days.—Exchange.

SAVING A WORK OF ART.

Ingenious Scheme of a Restorer of Damaged Masterpieces.

An instance of the ingenuity exercised by restorers of damaged masterpieces of painting is afforded by the rescue of a famous painting now owned by the widow of the late John Hay, secretary of state.

Mr. Hay had a Madonna by Botticelli which was painted on a wooden panel at least 400 years ago. The wood had begun to crack, and it was feared that the painting would be ruined, but a restorer was found who said he could save it.

The first step was to paste thin strips of tissue paper on the face of the picture, pressing the paper into the uneven surface of the paint. Layers were added until a thick body of paper concealed the picture.

Then the picture was turned over, and the restorer began to sandpaper the board away. After many months of careful work he had all the wood removed, and nothing but the paint adhered to the paper. A piece of linen canvas was then glued to the paint, and the work of removing the paper from the front of the picture was undertaken. It required nearly a year to complete the work, but when it was done the painting was left in shape to last another four centuries.—Chicago Record-Herald.

HE SAW THINGS.

The Boy Obeyed His Dad and Learned to Use His Eyes.

"Be observing, my son," said the father on one occasion. "Cultivate the habit of seeing, and you will be a successful man. Study things and remember them. Don't go through the world blindly. Learn to use your eyes. Boys who are observant know a great deal more than those who are not."

Willie listened in silence.

Several days later, when the entire family, consisting of his mother, aunt and uncle, were present, his father said:

"Well, Willie, have you kept using your eyes, as I advised you to do?"

Willie nodded and after a moment's hesitation said:

"I have seen a few things about the house. Uncle Jim's got a bottle of hair dye hid under his bed. Aunt Jennie's got an extra set of teeth and a lot of false hair in her dresser, ma's got some curls sewed in her hat, and pa's got a pack of cards and a box of dice and a leather covered flask behind the bookcase."—London Tit-Bits.

Plausible.

The Customer—Is that a real ostrich feather?

The Salesman—What, for tuppence! Oh, no, madam; "ostrich" is merely its nom de plume!—London Sketch.

Excellent.

"Do you know a good preventive for seasickness?"

"Yes."

"What is it?"

"R e m a i n ashore."

Even So.

"The devil is generally in good humor."

"He has reason to be."

"Why?"

"Because he has the majority of us working for him to beat the band."

Action was commenced against The Red Lake River Transportation Co. this week by the People's State Bank of Thief River Falls. We have not heard what for, but if they expect to get any finances out of the company, they shall have due credit for being smart.

County Superintendent of schools ... A. Mosbo spent Christmas with the home folks.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Lundeen and Mrs. Pete Gustafson were up to Highlanding Monday on a Christmas shopping trip.

THE BILLS MUST BE PAID.

School district 87 did not vote supplement funds at the annual meeting to pay for the books repairs on school house, and for the purchase of fuel. It became necessary to have storm windows placed on the school house which adds greatly to the defficiency and to make matters worse still some God forsaken cuss shot holes through the school house door during the summer vacation, which makes it necessary to buy a new door.

These bills must be paid, and in order to raise part of the money the board has decided to hold a basket social at the school house on Friday evening, January 3rd. Under the circumstances we hope there will not be any opposition to the raising of this money by this method.

Are You Public Spirited?

Are You Interested in The Men Who Represent You?

Do you want to know how how they vote on laws of importance to you, where and by whom those laws were drawn up?

Are you interested in whether your Representative gambles his time and beer money while he is away attending to your business?

If he is a County Optionist are you intereted in learning the location of the drug store he patronizes?

It will be the duty of

The Northwestern Legislature Reporter

to keep you informed weekly on all these things; to tell you whether your Representative is a friend of the CORPORATE INTERESTS, or of the PEOPLE.

We will expose all RIDERS, JOKERS, and CORPORATION WOODCHUCKS which are continuously foisted upon the people by their trusted Representatives.

We will throw our searchlight down all rat holes without fear or favor, and will have some very pertinent things to say on proposed legislation which a corporation owned newspaper could not bring before the public. We have at hand some very interesting facts gathered during the General Election, which will be interesting in connection with several proposed bills which are now drawn up ready to be brought before the Legislature. We will give you some red hot sizzling news that you will not find in any other newspaper. Among other things the evil arising from the entrance of the pulpit into politics, and its effect on the incoming Legislature.

We have a few personal paragraphs ready now, on some of the new Representatives, and their methods of becoming elected,

The regular retail price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but to introduce we will sell you a sample pair for $4.80 (cash with order $4.55).
NO MORE TROUBLE FROM PUNCTURES
DESCRIPTION: Made in all sizes. It is lively and easy riding, very durable and lined inside with a special quality of rubber, which never becomes porous and which closes up small punctures without allowing the air to escape. We have hundreds of letters from satisfied customers stating that their tires have only been pumped up once or twice in a whole season. They weigh no more than an ordinary tire, the puncture resisting qualities being given by several layers of thin, specially prepared fabric on the tread. The regular price of these tires is $10.00 per pair, but for advertising purposes we are making a special factory price to the rider of only $4.80 per pair. All orders shipped same day letter is received. We ship C. O. D. on approval. You do not pay a cent until you have examined and found them strictly as represented.
Notice the thick rubber tread "A" and puncture strips "B" and "D," also rim strip "H" to prevent rim cutting. This tire will outlast any other make—SOFT, ELASTIC and EASY RIDING.
We will allow a cash discount of 5 per cent (thereby making the price $4.55 per pair) if you send FULL CASH WITH ORDER and enclose this advertisement. You run no risk in sending us an order as the tires may be returned at OUR expense if for any reason they are not satisfactory on examination. We are perfectly reliable and money sent to us is as safe as in a bank. If you order a pair of these tires, you will find that they will ride easier, run faster, wear better, last longer and look finer than any tire you have ever used or seen at any price. We know that you will be so well pleased that when you want a bicycle you will give us your order. We want you to send us a trial order at once, hence this remarkable tire offer.
IF YOU NEED TIRES don't buy any kind at any price until you send for a pair of Hedgethorn Puncture-Proof tires on approval and trial at the special introductory price quoted above; or write for our big Tire and Sundry Catalogue which describes and quotes all makes and kinds of tires at about half the usual prices.
DO NOT WAIT but write us a postal today. DO NOT THINK OF BUYING a bicycle or a pair of tires from anyone until you know the new and wonderful offers we are making. It only costs a postal to learn everything. Write it NOW.

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Annie Gattle, a fellow-passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers. Mrs. Wellington hears Little Jimmie's voice. Later she meets Mrs. Whitcomb. Mallory reports to Marjorie his failure to find a preacher. They decide to pretend a quarrel and Mallory finds a vacant berth. Mrs. Jimmie discovers Wellington on the train. Mallory again makes an unsuccessful hunt for a preacher. Dr. Temple poses as a physician. Mrs. Temple is induced by Mrs. Wellington to smoke a cigar. Sight of preacher on a station platform raises Mallory's hopes, but he takes another train. Missing hand baggage compels the couple to borrow from passengers. Jimmie gets a cinder in his eye and Mrs. Jimmie gives first aid. Coolness is then resumed. Still no clergyman. More borrowing. Dr. Temple puzzled by behavior of different couples. Marjorie's jealousy aroused by Mallory's baseball jergon. Marjorie suggests wrecking the train in hopes that accident will produce a preacher. Also tries to induce conductor to hold the train so she can shop. Marjorie's dog is missing. She pulls the cord, stopping the train. Conductor restores dog and lovers quarrel. Lathrop wires for a preacher to marry him and Miss Gattle. Mallory tells Lathrop of his predicament and arranges to borrow the preacher. Kitty Lewellyn, former sweetheart of Mallory's, appears and arouses Marjorie's jealousy. Preacher boards train. After marrying Lathrop and Miss Gattle the preacher escapes Mallory by leaping from moving train. Mallory's dejection moves Marjorie to reconciliation. The last day on the train brings Mallory the fear of missing his transport. Mallory gets a Nevada marriage license. Marjorie refuses to be married by a divorce drummer. Mr. and Mrs. Jimmie make up. Kitty Lewellyn refuses to return Mallory's braclet. Robbers hold up the train. The passengers are relieved of their valuables.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—Continued.

Mr. Baumann was making an effort to take his leave, with great politeness.

"Excoose, please. I vant to get by, please!"

"Get by!" the other robber gasped. "Why, you—"

"But I'm not a passenger," Mr. Baumann urged, with a confidential smile, "I've been going through the train myself."

"Much obliged! Hand over!" And a rude hand rummaged his pockets. It was a heart-rending sight.

"Oi oi!" he wailed, "don't you allow no courtesies to the profession?" And when the inexorable thief continued to pluck his money, his watch, his scarf-pin, he grew wroth indeed. "Stop, stop, I refuse to pay. I'll go into bankruptcy foist." But still the larceny continued; fingers even lifted three cigars from his pockets, two for himself and a good one for a customer. This loss was grievous, but his wildest protest was: "Oh, bem, my frient, you don't vant my business carts."

"Keep 'em!" growled the thief, and then, glancing up, he saw on the tender inwards of Mr. Baumann's upheld palms two bugs glisteners, which their owner had turned that way in a misguided effort to conceal the stones. The robber reached up for them.

"Take 'em. You're velcome!" said Mr. Baumann, with rare presence of mind. "Those Nevada nearlies looks almost like real."

"Keep 'em," said the robber, as he passed on, and Mr. Baumann almost swooned with joy, for, as he whispered to Wedgewood a moment later: "They're really real!"

Now the eye-chain rolled the other way, for Little Jimmie Wellington was puffing with rage. The other robber, having massaged him thoroughly, but without success, for his pocketbook, noticed that Jimmie's left heel was protruding from his left shoe, and made Jimmie perform the almost incredible feat of standing on one foot while he unshod him and took out the hidden wealth.

"There goes our honeymoon, Lucretia," he moaned. But she whispered proudly: "Never mind, I have my rings to pawn."

"Oh, you have, have you? Well, I'll be your little uncle," the kneeling robber laughed, as he overheard, and he continued his outrageous search till he found them, knotted in a handkerchief, under her hat.

She protested. "You wouldn't leave me in Reno without a diamond, would you?"

"I wouldn't, eh?" he grunted. "Do you think I'm in this business for my health?"

And he snatched off two earrings she had forgotten. [illegible] nately, they were affixed to her lobes with fasteners.

Mrs. Jimmie was thoroughbred enough not to wince. She simply commented: "You brutes are almost as bad as the customs officers at New York."

And now another touch of light relieved the gloom. Kathleen was next in line, and she had been forcing her lips into their most attractive smile, and keeping her eyes winsomely mellow, for the robber's benefit. Marjorie could not see the smile; she could only see that Kathleen was next. She whispered to Mallory:

"They'll get the bracelet! They'll get the bracelet!"

And Mallory could have danced with glee. But Kathleen leaned coquettishly toward the masked stranger, and threw all her art into her tone as she murmured:

"I'm sure you're too brave to take my things. I've always admired men with the courage of Claude Duval."

The robber was taken a trifle aback, but he growled: "I don't know the party you speak of—but cough up!"

"Listen to her," Marjorie whispered in horror; "she's flirting with the train-robber."

"What won't some women flirt with!" Mallory exclaimed.

The robber studied Kathleen a little more attentively, as he whipped off her necklace and her rings. She looked good to him, and so willing, that he muttered: "Say, lady, if you'll give me a kiss, I'll give you that diamond ring you got on."

"All right!" laughed Kathleen, with triumphant compliance.

"My God!" Mallory groaned, "what won't some women do for a diamond!"

The robber bent close, and was just raising his mask to collect his ransom, when his confederate glanced his way, and knowing his susceptible nature, foresaw his intention, and shouted: "Stop it, Jake. You 'tend strictly to business, or I'll blow your nose off."

"Oh, all right," grumbled the reluctant gallant, as he drew the ring from her finger. "Sorry, miss, but I can't make the trade," and he added with an unwonted gentleness: "You can turn round now."

Kathleen was glad to hide the blushes of defeat; but Marjorie was still more bitterly disappointed. She whispered to Mallory: "He didn't get the bracelet, after all."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Wolves in the Fold.

Mallory's heart sank to its usual depth, but Marjorie had another of her inspirations. She startled everybody by suddenly beckoning and calling: "Excuse me, Mr. Robber. Come here, please."

The curious gallant edged her way, keeping a sharp watch along the line: "What d'you want?"

Marjorie leaned nearer, and spoke in a low tone with an amiable smile: "That lady who wanted to kiss you has a bracelet up her sleeve."

The robber stared across his mask, and wondered, but laughed, and grunted: "Much obliged." Then he went back, and lapped Kathleen on the shoulder. When she turned round, in the hope that he had reconsidered his refusal to make the trade, he infuriated her by growling: "Excuse me, miss, I overlooked a bet."

He ran his hand along her arm, and found her bracelet, and accomplished what Mallory had failed in, its removal.

"Don't, don't," cried Kathleen, "it's wished on."

"I wish it off," the villain laughed, and it joined the growing heap in the feed-bag.

Then he explored Mrs. Whitcomb, but with such small reward that he said: "Say, you'd oughter have a pocketbook somewhere. Where's it at?"

Mrs. Whitcomb blushed furiously: "None of your business, you low brute."

"Perdooce, madame," the scoundrel snorted, "perdooce the purse, or I'll hunt for it myself."

Mrs. Whitcomb turned away, and after some management of her skirts, slapped her handbag into the eager palm with a wrathful: "You're no gentleman, sir!"

"If I was, I'd be in Wall street," he laughed. "Now you can turn round." And when she turned, he saw a bit of chain depending from her back hair. He tugged, and brought away the locket, and then proceeded to sound Ashton for hidden wealth.

And now Mrs. Temple began to sob, as she parted with an old-fashioned brooch and two old-fashioned rings that had been her little vanities for the quarter of a century and more. The old clergyman could have wept with her at the vandalism. He turned on the wretch with a heartsick appeal:

"Can't you spare those? Didn't you ever have a mother?"

The robber started, his fierce eyes softened, his voice choked, and he gulped hard as he drew the back of his hand across his eyes.

"Aw, hell," he whimpered, "that ain't fair. If you're goin' to remind me of me poor old mo-mo-mother—"

But the one called Jake—the Claude Duval who had been prevented from a display of human sentiment, did not intend to be cheated. He thundered: "Stop it, Bill. You 'tend strictly to business, or I'll blow your mush-bowl off. You know your Maw died before you was born."

This reminder sobered the weeping thief at once, and he went back to work ruthlessly. "Oh, all right, Jake. [illegible] boss." And he dumped Mrs. Temple's trinkets into the satchel. It was too much for the little old lady's little old husband. He fairly shrieked:

"Young man, you're a damned scoundrel, and the best argument I ever saw for hell-fire!"

Mrs. Temple's grief changed to horror at such a bolt from the blue: "Walter!" she gasped, "such language!"

But her husband answered in self-defense: "Even a minister has a right to swear once in his lifetime."

Mallory almost dropped in his tracks, and Marjorie keeled over on him, as he gasped: "Good Lord, Dr. Temple, you are a—a minister?"

"Yes, my boy," the old man confessed, glad that the robbers had relieved him of his guilty secret along with the rest of his private properties. Mallory looked at the collapsing Marjorie and groaned: "And, he was in the next berth all this time!"

The unmasking of the old fraud made a second sensation. Mrs. Fosdick called from far down the aisle: "Dr. Temple, you're not a detective?"

Mrs. Temple shouted back furiously: "How dare you?"

But Mrs. Fosdick was crying to her luscious-eyed mate: "Oh, Arthur, he's not a detective. Embrace me!"

And they embraced, while the robbers looked on aghast at the sudden oblivion they had fallen into. They focussed the attention on themselves again, however, with a ferocious: "Here, hands up!" But they did not see Mr. and Mrs. Fosdick steal a kiss behind their upraised arms, for the robber to whose lot Mallory fell was gloating over his well-filled wallet. Mallory saw it go with fortitude, but noting a piece of legal paper, he said: "Say, old man, you don't want that marriage license, do you?"

The robber handled it as if it were hot—as if he had burned his fingers on some such document once before, and he stuffed it back in Mallory's pocket. "I should say not. Keep it. Turn round."

Meanwhile the other felon turned up another beautiful pile of bills in Dr. Temple's pocket. "Not so worse for a parson," he grinned. "You must be one of them Fifth avenue sky-shuffures."

And now Mrs. Temple's gentle eyes and voice filled with tears again: "Oh, don't take that. That's the money for his vacation—after thirty long years. Please don't take that."

Her appeals seemed always to find the tender spot of this robber's heart, for he hesitated, and called out: "Shall we overlook the parson's wad, podner?"

"Take it, and shut up, you mollycoddin!" was the answer he got, and the vacation funds joined the old gewgaws.

And now everybody had been robbed but Marjorie. She happened to be at the center of the line, and both men reached her at the same time: "I seen her first," the first one shouted.

"You did not," the other roared.

"I tell you I did."

"I tell you I did." They glared threateningly at each other, and their revolvers seemed to meet, like two game cocks, beak to beak.

The porter voiced the general hope, when he sighed: "Oh, Lawd, if they'd only shoot each other."

This brought the rivals to their evil senses, and they swept the line with those terrifying muzzles and that heart-stopping yelp: "Hands up!"

Bill said: "You take the east side of her, and I'll take the west."

"All right."

And they began to snatch away her side-combs, the little gold chain at her throat, the jeweled pin that Mallory had given her as the first token of his love.

The young soldier had foreseen this. He had foreseen the wild rage that would unseat his reason when he saw the dirty hands of thieves laid rudely on the sacred body of his beloved. But his soldier-schooling had drilled him to govern his impulses, to play the coward when there was no hope of successful battle, and to strike only when the moment was ripe with perfect opportunity.

He had kept telling himself that when the finger of one of these men touched so much as Marjorie's hem, he would be forced to fling himself on the profane miscreant. And he kept telling himself that the moment he did this, the other man would calmly blow a hole through him, and drop him at Marjorie's feet, while the other passengers shrank away in terror.

He told himself that, while it might be a fine impulse to leap to her defense, it was a fool impulse to leap off a precipice and leave Marjorie alone among strangers, with a dead man and a scandal as the only rewards for his impulse. He vowed that he would hold himself in check, and let the robbers take everything, leaving him only the name of coward, provided they left him also the power to defend Marjorie better at another time.

And now that he saw the clumsy-handed thugs rifling his sweetheart's jewelry, he felt all that he had foreseen, and his head fought almost in vain against the white fire of his heart. Between them he trembled like a leaf, and the sweat globed on his forehead.

The worst of it was the shivering terror of Marjorie, and the pitiful eyes she turned on him. But he clenched his teeth and waited, thinking fiercely, watching, like a hovering eagle, a chance to swoop.

LOST IN A DESERT

Strange Adventure of a Country Girl Alone in a Big City.

By GERTRUDE MARY SHERIDAN.

A lonely hour, a lonely spot, and the loneliest girl in the world looking out over the fast darkening lake in a dreamy, desolate way. Nellie Danvers had come to the beach of the great city's breathing spot after a hard day's work.

She had wandered purposely away from the crowds. A sense of utter friendlessness overcame her. A sad, far-away look was in her eyes. Life seemed very hard to the young girl. An orphan, leaving distant relatives in a country village a year previous, she had come to the city to find herself disillusioned, lost in a desert.

She had learned how to operate a typewriter and had secured a subordinate situation at six dollars a week, humdrum, dragging labor. She felt that it was only a step to the sweat shop or the sales counter if she lost her present position.

"Perhaps I am worked out," she thought. "A week in the country might influence me to face the dreary winter with a brighter spirit. It is useless to consider that, so I'll try and be content. There are the books and my painting—oh, dear!"

Nellie drew back with a timid start. A man had come rushing from a line of bushes, two little children with him. In the moonlight glow his face showed pale, delicate and refined, but his eyes shone like living sparks of fire.

"Quick!" he said, his glance burning full into the face of the shrinking girl. "These two children—take them. Where do you live?"

Some influence Nellie could not resist compelled her to reply in a tremor:

"Twenty-two Borden place."

The man pushed the children towards her and then dashed down the beach. A second man came into view on a swift run. He approached the bewildered Nellie.

"The man who had these children"—he spoke rapidly—"which way did he go?"

Mutely Nellie pointed. The man ran on. He, too, disappeared. She looked down at the children. One had clasped her dress, hiding her face in its folds, and was sobbing wearily. The other stood staring about her as if half stunned by the alarming occurrences of the moment.

"Lock the Door."

Amid her own friendlessness Nellie's heart went out to the deserted little ones. She sank again to the sand, drawing them towards her. They folded into her caresses like storm-tossed refugees. First one and then the other of the little ones went to sleep, their heads pillowed in her lap as if from sheer exhaustion.

One hour—two. No one appeared. The dews were falling heavily and Nellie aroused the sleepers. The younger one she had to carry in her arms. Her sister she led by the hand, sleepy-eyed and tired.

There was nothing for Nellie to do but take the children to her room. She placed them on her own bed. She did not sleep the long night through. Every moment she expected a visit from the man to whom she had given her address.

He did not come. In the morning she interested her landlady in looking after the children while she was away. They were charming little ones who wound themselves about both hearts.

A week went by—two of them. Almost unconsciously, Nellie grew into loving the abandoned children.

The mystery surrounding them troubled her, but she found a new interest in life. Nellie had to make her little salary go a long ways now, but the children thrown, loved her, and were happy as the day was long.

One evening Nellie had just put her charges to bed when a sharp tap came to the door. She opened it. A stranger hurried by her.

"Lock the door!" he said huskily. "The children—they are safe?"

Then Nellie pierced the disguise of the man of the beach. He sank to a chair, breathless. A smile of gladness and relief crossed his face as Nellie told him of the little ones.

"Oh, you brave, true girl!" he said fervently. "I knew from your face I could trust you."

"Open this door!" sounded harshly, and with a crash the barrier burst in. Two men entered.

"We've caught you at last, have we?" said one of them in triumph. "You've led us a long chase."

"Wait," spoke the man; "I wish to make an explanation to this young lady, who has been a friend to my orphaned nieces. Miss, these men are arresting me for counterfeiting. I am innocent."

"It looks like it, when we have just recovered the two best counterfeit plates ever made," said one of the men.

"I made them," said the prisoner quietly, "but when you hear my story you may change your opinion of me. You say you have found the plates?"

"Yes."

"Then I am saved—it was all that I was waiting for," declared the prisoner. "My former business was that of an expert engraver. On account of an invalid brother, the father of two little girls, I gave up my business and bought Rose Cottage at Frampton."

"We know all about that."

"My brother died. I was taken ill and went out of my mind as a result. They placed me in an asylum and the little ones in an orphan's home. A year ago I was kidnapped and taken to a lonely building in the city here. My captors were a gang of dangerous counterfeiters. They set me at work making a counterfeit plate. Two months ago a complete return of reason came to me in the midst of my innocent mechanical work. I refused to proceed with it. My enemies threatened to kill my little nieces if I did not go on with the work."

"Which you did?"

"Yes, and completed the plates the day you made the descent on their den. I escaped. Then, knowing the men had taken the plates with them, I sought to leave the country. I got the children from the asylum. You people found my trail. Since then I have been dodging you, but now—"

"Well, what now?" inquired one of the officers.

"Take a proof of those plates. You will find that the last work I did on them was to delicately trace over both plates one word."

"What was it?"

"'Counterfeit!'"

It took the police a week to verify the story of Adrian Noble, engraver. Then, overwhelming Nellie with gratitude, he went home to Rose Cottage.

A week later he reappeared. Nellie's mind had been full of him since she had first pitied his sufferings, and she was glad to see him.

"I couldn't stand it any longer, Miss Danvers," he said earnestly. "The little ones mourn for you all day, and I—dear young lady, whose goodness to me and mine will irradiate all my life, can I help but respect and—love you? Come home with me to the dear little ones, as my wife."

Peace after strife, love after loneliness, joy after gloom, and rest, glorious rest—heaven on earth seemed to come to the tempest-tossed Nellie at beautiful Rose Cottage.

AMERICAN MUSEUM HAS PRIZE

Specimen of Giant Forest Pig Placed in National Institution of Natural History.

Africa is not only preeminantly the land of mammals; it is the home of many large and curious beasts, says Dr. Frederic A. Lucas, director of the American Museum of Natural History.

From Alfred J. Klein the museum has received specimens of the giant forest pig, which have been mounted by F. Blaschke and placed on exhibition.

"For something like fifteen years," says Doctor Lucas, "it was suspected that the forests of Central Africa harbored some giant member of the hog family, but owing to the retiring habits of the animal it was not until 1904 that a specimen fell into the hands of a naturalist and the animal was properly introduced to the scientific world.

"Very little is known of this new acquisition at the museum, partly on account of the habits of the animal, which are nocturnal, and its abode in the tall grass of the jungle.

"The hunter forces his way through the bamboos and underbrush up to his eyes in grass—there is a grunt and a rush away and the game is never seen.

"On the slopes of Mount Kenia at an elevation of 6,000 feet Carl E. Akeley found evidences of numbers of these pigs, their tracks following the elephant trails in that region."

The body of the forest pig is deep and heavy and its head is long and equipped with upturned ferocious looking tusks. It is said to be quick and powerful when in action.

"It is quite probable that other curious specimens remain to be discovered," says Doctor Luca, "although with the rapid opening up of the country and its exploration by sportsmen it would seem that its possibilities must ere long be exhausted.

Futurist Description of a Battle.

The Futurists, who hoped to create a revolution in art, but so far have been greeted with jeers, are now turning their attention to literature. According to their prophet, Signor Marinetti, adjectives, adverbs and verbs are to be eliminated. Substantives are alone to be used, and they will then have their full dynamic properties. What the dynamic properties are will appear from the following futurist description of a battle—"Fifes, clatter, hoofs, boom! boom! Alarum, crack! crack! whizz! buzz! bang whoop! Guns, manes, swords, caissons, charges, smoke, charges smoke, smoke, whirlwind, stench blood, groans, shrieks, victory, death!"

Baking Made Almost Automatic.

Science has done many wonderful things in the way of lightening kitchen-work but possibly the most welcome of all its many achievements is the prepartion of a baking powder that makes baking almost automatic.

This wonderful baking powder is known as Calumet Baking Powder.

As you perhaps know from your own experience—baking is largely a matter of "luck." If your baking powder happens to be just right, your baking will be good. But if it varies in quality or in strength—as so many baking powders do, your bakings are more than likely to be ruined.

Calumet Baking Powder puts a stop to the dependence on "luck." With it, all quickly-raised foods can be made without the slightest trouble—made pure and wholesome and tasty. For Calumet itself is pure in the can and in the baking—and so uniform in quality, so carefully prepared, that failures are impossible. You can judge of its purity, too, when you know that it has been given the highest awards at two World's Pure Food Expositions—one at Chicago in 1907 and the other at Paris, France, last March. Adv.

HE KNEW HIM.

"The doctor is keeping old Skincm's cough down."

"Yes, and after he has cured him he'll have to give him something to make him cough up."

RINGWORM ON CHILD'S FACE

Stratford, Iowa.—"Three years ago this winter my seven-year-old son had ringworm on the face. First it was in small red spots which had a rough crust on the top. When they started they looked like little red dots and then they got bigger, about the size of a bird's egg. They had a white rough ring around them, and grew continually worse and soon spread over his face and legs. The child suffered terrible itching and burning, so that he could not sleep nights. He scratched them and they looked fearful. He was cross when he had them. We used several bottles of liniment, but nothing helped.

"I saw where a child had a rash on the face and was cured by Cuticura Soap and Ointment and I decided to use them. I used Cuticura Soap and Ointment about one month, and they cured my child completely." (Signed) Mrs. Barbara Prim, Jan. 30, 1912.

Never Liked Oats.

Frenchmen have never liked oats; doctors have urged them to try the national dish of the Scotch, but they have politely refused.

But one group of Frenchmen could not escape; this was a company of the One Hundred and Twenty-eighth infantry, whose captain insisted that his men should eat oatmeal porridge for a month. He had the oatmeal toasted to improve the taste.

To their surprise, his men found that after a month of maneuvers they did not have a single man on the sick list, while other companies had as many as a dozen. They have made up their minds that oats are not so bad after all.

Locating the Fool.

A stout old gentleman was having trouble with the telephone. He could hear nothing but a confused jumble of sounds, and finally he became so exasperated that he shouted into the transmitter:

"Who's the blithering fool at the end of this line?"

"He's not at this end," answered a cool, feminine voice.

Best Way.

"How can I float a loan?"

"Borrow from the men who are trying to get into the swim."

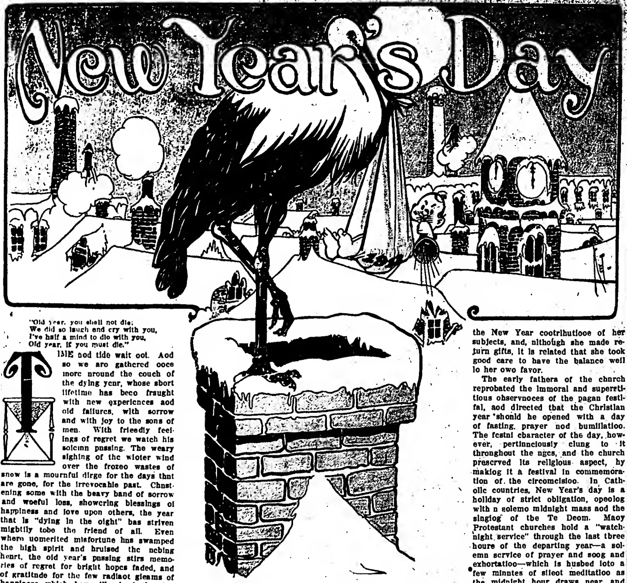
New Year's Day



"Old year, you shall not die;
We did so laugh and cry with you,
I've half a mind to die with you,
Old year, if you must die."

TIME and tide wait not. And so we are gathered once more around the couch of the dying year, whose short lifetime has been fraught with new experiences and old failures, with sorrow and with joy to the sons of men. With friendly feelings of regret we watch his solemn passing. The weary sighing of the winter wind over the frozen wastes of snow is a mournful dirge for the days that are gone, for the irrevocable past. Chastening some with the heavy band of sorrow and woeful loss, showering blessings of happiness and love upon others, the year that is "dying in the night" has striven mightily to be the friend of all. Even where unmerited misfortune has swamped the high spirit and bruised the aching heart, the old year's passing stirs memories of regret for bright hopes faded, and of gratitude for the few radiant gleams of happiness which have illumined the darkness.

By a natural force of habit, with many the declining moments of the old year are devoted to a sort of spiritual stock-taking. The mistakes and the offenses of the past are canvassed over during this "burial of last year's sins," and resolutions of reformation adopted for future guidance. It has been said that those who make good resolutions are only those who break them. Too often they are simply the impotent products of lingering habit, aroused to life in the bewildering swirl of a customary moral house cleaning, and doomed to a brief existence. A momentary repentance, induced by the solemnity and associations of the season, does not affect much material change in the moral capacity for clean living. Generally, something is bound to give way when new wine is put into old bottles. To do as a matter of course that which is right as it comes is the true secret of a good life, and becomes in time a force more persistent and effectual than the weak-kneed habit of shipping an ill-assorted deck cargo of good resolutions, whose shifting in bad weather will give serious trouble until it is jettisoned, or swept overboard.

But bosh! the hour is near. The old man is breathing hard, his eyes grow dim, the hue of death is spreading over his hollow cheeks and wrinkled brows. Soon he will be gone, forgotten with the trouble and sorrow, the joy and delight, he brought in his train. "Across the waste his son and heir doth ride post-haste," and we prepare to salute the rising sun, to make the rafters ring with "The king is dead, long live the king." And so, unmindful of "benefits forgot," with regret and remembrance buried deep in the joy of the moment, we hail the signals of the momentous change—the blaring of sirens and the boom of cannon, the cheering of revelling crowds and the mad joyous clangor of multitudinous bells.

Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light:
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.

The blessed glad new year is coming, heralded with rejoicing, and resplendent with hope. "There's a new foot on the floor, my friend, and a new face at the door." Bacchus and Venus and bright-eyed Hebe give welcome and homage to the newcomer, and salute the opening of his reign with mirthful song and joyous laughter. The festive celebration of the new year has been a salient feature in the social life of all civilized peoples, ancient and modern, and that characteristic persists in the strenuous life of today.

The time at which the year began varied much among different nations. The Carthaginians, Egyptians, Persians and other nations of antiquity began their year at the autumnal equinox, New Year's day falling on September 22, of modern reckoning, which is also the beginning of the Jewish civil year. The Greeks chose December 22, and afterward June 22. January 1 was first adopted by the Romans, when Julius Caesar brought the civil year into close harmony with the solar, in B. C. 46, but, for many centuries, the example was not followed by subsequent European nations. At one time there were seven different dates for the beginning of the year among the Christian nations, and even successive popes, until comparatively recent times, scarcely ever adopted the same chronology. Russia and the eastern empire of Constantine dated from September 1, and the Mohammedan year, being dependent on the phases of the moon, had and has no fixed beginning. January 1 became the accepted date of the New Year among the Catholic nations of Europe in 1582, when Pope Gregory XIII introduced the new style of reckoning, and corrected the accumulated discrepancies between the Julian computation and the actual solar year by striking ten days out of the almanac of that year. By 1700 this date was in general use throughout Europe, but it was not until 1752 that England and her American colonies adopted it.

Ancient and modern civilized peoples, while differing as to the day from which they reckoned the beginning of the civil year, have agreed in distinguishing it by special festivities and religious observances. The Romans dedicated January 1 to the oldest of their gods, Janus of the two faces, one youthful and one aged—a symbol of the wisdom of the god who knows the past and can peer into the future. They sacrificed to him on twelve altars, and were careful so to order their conduct on New Year's day that every word and action should be a happy augury of the twelve months of the coming year. Kindly salutations and presents of figs, dates and sweetmeats were exchanged among the people, holiday dress was worn, and feasting became universal. New Year presents became under the Caesars a source of great personal profit to the ruler, and an onerous burden to his subjects. The infamous Caligula, making it known that his daughter required a dowry at the New Year, walked barefooted over the piles of gold which covered the courtyard of his palace—gifts of the terrorized Roman citizens. How this custom persisted down the ages may be gathered from the fact that, even as late as the reign of William and Mary, the English nobility were accustomed to "send to the king a purse with gold in it, every New Year's tide." Queen Elizabeth's wardrobe and jewelry were almost wholly supplied from the New Year contributions of her subjects, and, although she made return gifts, it is related that she took good care to have the balance well in her own favor.

The early fathers of the church reprobated the immoral and superstitious observances of the pagan festival, and directed that the Christian year should be opened with a day of fasting, prayer and humiliation. The festal character of the day, however, pertinaciously clung to it throughout the ages, and the church preserved its religious aspect, by making it a festival in commemoration of the circumcision. In Catholic countries, New Year's day is a holiday of strict obligation, opening with a solemn midnight mass and the singing of the Te Deum. Many Protestant churches hold a "watch-night service" through the last three hours of the departing year—a solemn service of prayer and song and exhortation—which is hushed into a few minutes of silent meditation as the midnight hour draws near, and then breaks forth into a song of praise, greeting the first moment of the new-born year.

THE VANISHED YEAR

Once again a year has vanished,
To the realm of bygones banished,
Where the past years sleep in glory—
Not forgotten—gone before—
And the New Year comes to greet us,
On the wings of Time to meet us,
And to tell the old, old story
Of the years that are no more.

In the wings of Time, swift flying,
Lies the Old Year, sighing, dying,
Borne to join the host that slumbers
On that distant unknown shore—
Borne to join the countless legion,
That have crossed that mystic region,
And are counted with the numbers
In that land of Nevermore.

Once again the bells are ringing,
Tidings of the New Year bringing,
With the blythe and gladsome clangor
Of the bells that rang of yore,
And their glad and tuneful pealing,
Brighter, fairer skies revealing,
Bids us banish sorrow, anger,
Think of gladness yet in store.

Let us greet the New Year gladly—
Though we miss the old one sadly—
Let us hope for bright skies o'er us,
Let our dreams be ever fair—
Let us banish care and sorrow,
Hope for gladness on the morrow—
Let us build for days before us
Brighter castles in the air.

CAN YOUR BABY FIND ITS NOSE.

Here Are Some of the Tests for Determining Normal Child.

If a child of three years knows his name and can thrust a chubby finger to his nose, mouth and eyes, when asked about those organs, he's a normal kid. If he can't, then it's time papa and mamma get busy with petty's little think tank, or he'll grow up to be a boob.

This, in plain Boweryesque, is the translation of the formula given in scientific terms by the medical savants of the Mental Hygiene conference and exhibit, who are holding "tests of children" in the hall of the city college, remarks the New York Journal.

"A child of four," continues the scientific formula, "is expected to know its sex and to be able to recognize such objects as a key, knife or a penny, and to tell the comparative length of lines.

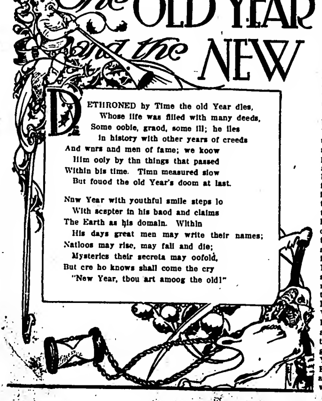
"At five a boy or girl should be able to draw a square and to repeat sentences. When a child is six we ask for definitions. I might ask: 'What is a fork?' If a boy answered: 'I eat with a fork,' it would be sufficient for that age, but if he inserted the word 'something' in his definition, as 'A fork is something to eat with,' it would place him in the eight-year class. If he said: 'A piece of tableware,' he would be in the twelve-year class."

A child of ten is asked what he would do if he missed a train. Here the answers vary. Any reply that is an answer is accepted. One child said: "Wait for another." Another said he would "run and catch it." While a boy from the Bronx said he would go home for the day.

What to do if struck by a playmate was the most puzzling of all questions. Boys invariably looked at their mothers when the question was put. "Forgive him," was the answer only a few times.

The best examination passed so far was by seven-year-old Donald Grant of 507 West [illegible] street, who passed the examination for the child of ten.

The OLD YEAR and the NEW



DETHRONED by Time the old Year dies,
Whose life was filled with many deeds,
Some noble, grand, some ill; he lies
In history with other years of creeds
And wars and men of fame; we know
Him only by the things that passed
Within his time. Time measured slow
But found the old Year's doom at last.

New Year with youthful smile steps in
With scepter in his hand and claims
The Earth as his domain. Within
His days great men may write their names;
Nations may rise, may fall and die;
Mysteries their secrets may unfold,
But ere he knows shall come the cry
"New Year, thou art among the old!"

Lover's Unique Devotion.

An unusual manner in which a lover's devotion was shown occurred at Zurich, Switzerland, recently. A cobbler, whose sweetheart died, apprenticed himself to a stone-cutter in order to execute a fitting tribute to her memory, and after fourteen months he was able to carve a beautiful rose on a marble slab and write beneath: "Such was she." After it had been erected over her grave he returned to his first trade, and now repairs shoes as before.

ALBERTA

IS HIGH AND SO IS THE PRICE OF CATTLE.

For years the Province of Alberta (Western Canada) was the Big Ranching Country. Many of these ranches today are immense grain fields and the cattle have given place to the cultivation of wheat, oats, barley and flax; the change has made many thousands of Americans, settled on these plains, wealthy, but it has increased the price of livestock.

There is splendid opportunity now to get a

of 160 acres (and another as a preemption) in the newer districts and produce either cattle or grain. The crops are always good, the climate is excellent, schools and churches are convenient, markets splendid, in either Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyser

THE LIGHTNING FLASH

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

THE following letter was from a gentleman holding a high position in the diplomatic world:

> "Dear Monsieur Goron: I earnestly beg of you to come to the assistance of my friend, who has met with a disastrous adventure. Please do everything in your power to extricate him from the horrible position in which he is placed. I can vouch for his honorableness.
>
> "Yours gratefully,
> "L. de V——."

After I had read it I glanced at the bearer, a young, distinguished-looking man.

With a slight tremor in his voice, he said:

"I am in great trouble."

"I see you are," I replied; "and I hear you are English. What brings you here?"

He paused an instant, and, passing his hand across his forehead, repeated:

"I am in great trouble."

With a gesture, as if anxious to throw off his secret, he continued:

"My name is Allen B——, and my father is one of the largest colliery owners in the north of England. Six months ago I came to Paris to study painting—"

Again he paused, staring at me. Then suddenly he asked:

"Do I look like a swindler—a sharper?"

"No; you do not. Why do you ask?"

"Because, a fortnight ago I rose in the morning with an untarnished reputation, and, although I had committed no wrong whatever, I went to bed a disgraced man."

He was laboring under strong emotion; and as he remained silent, I said:

"Tell me what has occurred."

"It fell upon me like a thunderbolt, at the house of Madame J——, where I used to go once a week for a game of cards. I was playing piquet, in the smoking room, with a young fellow called Bernard T——, and had won the first game. We had just begun the third, when Bernard jumped up and shrieked:

"'I have caught you at last. You are cheating!'

"The men at the other tables crowded around us, and Madame J——, her daughter Genevieve, and their guests came running in from the adjoining drawing room attracted by the noise.

"I had grasped Bernard by the throat, calling out, 'Retract what you said, you villain, or I will kill you!'

"They dragged him away from me. He was as white as a sheet; and the moment he had caught his breath, he shook his fist at me, and bawled:

"You say you'll kill me? You want me to retract? I tell you, you are a cheat, a dirty cheat! Gentlemen, ask him to empty his pockets, here before you, and you'll see whether I am right!"

"I put my hands in the pockets of my smoking jacket, and pulled out a dozen cards, corner-bent, like those used by professional sharpers.

"There was a moment of silence, and then the Vicomte de St. —— said to me: 'This is a very serious affair. Have you any explanation to offer?'

"Then the horror of my situation came upon me. I tried to rush at Bernard, but they laid hold of me. Frantic with rage, I shook them off.

"'It's a lie! It's a lie!' I shouted. 'Gentlemen, this fellow, or some other scoundrel, has—heavens knows why—slipped these cards into my pocket. It is a fiendish trick some one has played; and I call upon those here who know me to help to unmask the coward who did it!'

"They looked at me in silence, and after whispered consultation, the Vicomte de St. —— spoke again:

"'Mr. B——, I think it will be best if you and M. Bernard T—— withdraw for a few minutes to allow us to discuss this matter, and decide on the course to take.'

"Bernard went upstairs to Madame's boudoir, and I to the drawing room, where I found Mademoiselle Genevieve alone. For a while she took no notice of me as I nervously paced up and down the room, but when I stopped she remarked in a soft voice:

"'Monsieur Allen, I am sure you are innocent.'

"I pressed her hand.

"'God bless you, Mademoiselle Genevieve; I shall never forget your confidence in me. But, since you do not doubt me, I implore you to tell me whether you have any suspicion, any idea, as to who could have laid this trap for me?'

"She thought a moment, and then replied:

"'No, Monsieur Allen, I have not the faintest idea. I wish I could help you.'

"She looked up, and I could read in her eyes that she had spoken the truth.

"At that instant a gentleman asked me to come into the next room, where the Vicomte de St. —— addressed me as follows:

"'Having been the unwilling witnesses of this affair, we consider it our duty as gentlemen and men of the world, to prevent any unnecessary scandal. M. Bernard T—— has accused you of playing unfairly, which you deny. Marked cards have been found in your pockets, and your explanation is that some one had placed them there. We now have pledged ourselves not to divulge what has occurred here this evening, so as to give you time to refute this charge. You can rely on our absolute discretion; and I call upon M. Bernard T—— to promise us not to breathe a word about this to any one.'

"'I give you my word,' said Bernard.

"'His word!' I exclaimed; 'how much do you think it is worth? Gentlemen, I once more declare that this man is a liar, and that, if he did not put the cards in my pockets, he knows who did. And—'

"'Pardon me,' interrupted the vicomte, 'we cannot allow this. We sincerely hope you may prove your innocence—we hope it for your sake. And this is all we have to say to you for the present.'"

After a pause my visitor resumed:

"I have no recollection of how I got home that evening; and even the next morning I could not realize that it had not been a fearful dream. Several days I spent trying to unravel this mystery, when I received two letters from England. The first was from my father. The poor man is heart-broken. He had had a full account of what had occurred at Madame's house. He advised me to go away, somewhere in the Colonies, and remain there till this affair is forgotten. The other letter was—"

He again stopped, and hid his face in his hands.

"It was from my fiancee, the girl I was to have married in three months, on my return to England. She, too, knew all about it, and informed me that I must consider our engagement at an end. I at once wrote to my father and to my fiancee, telling them that I had been the victim of a horrible plot, imploring them to reply by return post; but neither of them has sent me a line. I then remembered my friend, L. de V——, a school-chum, now on the diplomatic service. He has known me all my life; and, after I had told him my story, he gave me this introduction to you. Monsieur Goron, I beg of you to help me!"

"I certainly will try to help you," I replied; "but your story is incomplete. I want to hear more about these people—the vicomte, Bernard T——, Madame J——, and even—if you allow me—Mademoiselle Genevieve. Who are they?"

"Madame J—— is the widow of a naval officer. I was introduced to her the first week I arrived in Paris, by a man in the studio where I was painting. She received every other evening. The vicomte is an old friend of hers, and, I am told, a member of the Jockey club. Bernard T—— I met also at Madame's house. We have often dined together and gone to theaters."

"Has he a profession? How does he get his living?"

"He is, I think, an insurance broker; but he has money, and does not seem to work very hard."

"And Mademoiselle Genevieve? Last, but probably not least?"

"You are right, Monsieur Goron—last, but not least; for I believe she is the innocent cause of this business. I have been thinking night and day, and I am sure I have found the clue to this mystery."

He colored slightly and said:

"I am afraid what I am going to tell you will sound rather foolish, but you will see it is important. Bernard T—— is in love with Genevieve, a strikingly handsome girl. She had of late shown me marked partiality, and in his mad jealousy Bernard has planned this to ruin me in her eyes."

"And this, according to you, is the clue to the affair?"

"Undoubtedly. There can be no other cause why anybody should try to compromise me in such a horrible way. With your help we will get to the bottom of it."

"It is a queer, a very queer business; darker than you seem to think. I do not say this to alarm you, but to prepare you for a few surprises. Give me the addresses of all the people you have just mentioned, and come here to-morrow at four o'clock. Don't think of revenge; this may, or may not, come later. The first thing to be done is to clear you."

My visitor thanked me and went away with a lighter step. But when he returned the following day he looked more distressed than before.

"What has gone wrong?" I asked. "Any fresh trouble?"

"No," he replied moodily, "except that I have had a letter from our lawyer begging me to go away at once—for the honor of the family."

With a suppressed oath he threw the letter on my table.

"Never mind the lawyer. Tell him to go to the Colonies himself. Since I saw you I have looked into the matter, and have gathered a little useful information. First, let me tell you that your theory about Bernard's jealousy does not hold water. Excuse my asking you—have you ever, say, flirted, with the girl?"

"Never."

"Have you given her any presents, or made appointments with her?"

"Never."

"All the better, for it simplifies matters. Another question. Do they play baccarat at Madame J——'s?"

"Yes, three or four times a week."

"Did you play?"

"Yes, but I gave up because—"

"You found you lost too much?"

"You've guessed it. I did lose."

"How much?"

"About two thousand dollars."

"Just what I expected. I have received some queer reports about your friends. Madame J——'s reputation is far from good, and I suspect her salon to be a trap to swindle people like you. Bernard T—— certainly did inherit some money last year, but he ran through it; and he is now the associate, and possibly the tool, of professional gamblers. As to the vicomte, there is some mystery here, and I distrust mysteries. And now, my dear Mr. B——, I am afraid I must say something that will upset you. You have undoubtedly an enemy—not that Bernard—but a man, or woman, who has a more potent interest in ruining your reputation. Look into the past, and see whether you can detect any such person."

Mr. B—— stared at me in amazement.

"An enemy!" he cried. "I, an enemy? I have never stood in anybody's way, and no man in mine. As to women, they have played no part in my life. I have fallen in love only once—and that with the girl I was to have married," he added with a bitter smile.

"You will not be the first to have made such a startling discovery. Others have made it; and in this very room, too. I see I cannot look to you for assistance in this business. Keep quiet until you hear from me. I hope it will be soon."

I do not know a more villainous offense than that of sullying a man's reputation, to rob him of what is dearer to him than life—his honor. And I resolved to use all my energy to come to this poor fellow's assistance; especially as the conviction grew upon me that my young friend was the victim of a plot, a fiendish conspiracy, and that those who slipped the incriminating cards into his pocket were only the instruments of scoundrels who would remain in the dark, unless I dragged them into the light.

I HELD MY BREATH WHEN THE FIRST CARDS WERE DEALT.

During his narrative of the tragic scene at Madame J——'s house, I had not been favorably impressed by the attitude of this vicomte, the self-constituted president of the impromptu tribunal of honor. I therefore decided to leave the fiery Bernard alone for the present, and take the mysterious nobleman in hand, after having first found out who he was.

I confided the latter mission to Nicholas, one of my men, whom his colleagues had nicknamed the "Diver," because of his wonderful skill in "diving" into people's pasts, and unearthing the most hidden secrets. I did not see my "diver" for two days; but when he turned up he looked happy, and handed me his report. It was one of his weaknesses. He had started life as a writing-master; and as he wrote a beautiful hand, he seized every opportunity of displaying it.

The report read as follows:

>
> "Hector St. ——, born in Paris in 1850, from Greek parents. Enlisted at nineteen in the Papal Zouaves. Three years later emigrated to Australia. In 1875 was in Italy, where received the title of vicomte from the Pope. In Florence eloped with the wife of a well-known banker. Came to Paris, and in 1879 was implicated in turf scandal. For reasons that did not transpire, was asked to resign his membership of the Y—— Club. Remained two years in England, after which he returned to Paris. Has small apartment in Rue Labordere. Is well known in the baccarat world. Is one of the supporters of new gambling-club opened a month ago in the Rue Maubeuge. Goes there nearly every night. Means unknown; but is not believed to have a fixed income.
>
> "P. S.—The night before last, at half-past twelve, sent for a policeman because Marthe D——, his former sweetheart, was creating a disturbance outside his place."

The Diver had acquitted himself well of his task, and I told him so. But what he could not know was that the most important part of his report was in the postscript.

I went to the police commissary in the vicomte's district and asked him to give me some details about the disturbance caused by Martha D——. She had, it seems, smashed a window, using threatening language, and the vicomte had applied for a summons.

I sent for her, and a little before six she was announced; a tall, dark-eyed girl, who played an insignificant part in the new farce at the Folies-Dramatiques. She was very self-possessed; and asked what I wanted of her.

"And so you had a scene with your friend, the vicomte?"

She turned sharply around, and her eyes grew warlike.

"My 'friend,' you call him? I can dispense with such friends. When a man borrows money from a woman, and does not pay her, the least he can do is to be civil to her!"

"That is true. Why did he borrow money from you?"

"I don't know. At times he has plenty of cash, and at others not a cent."

"I suppose he gambles a bit?"

"You bet! Since he goes to that new club in the Rue Maubeuge, he is always flush with money. He has been wonderfully lucky there; too much so, I fancy."

"Why too much so?"

"Oh, I don't know!" And she shrugged her shoulders.

I did not think it prudent to press the point.

"If he borrowed money from you, and, as you say, has now plenty, why does he not pay you?"

"He might have done so; but he has his silly pride. He was annoyed that I alluded to it in the presence of his friend, an Englishman—although that man did not understand a word of French—and he had specially asked me to come that evening. I would have done better to have gone away, as I was getting cross at their talking English all the time."

"Possibly he, too, was cross, if the Englishman paid you too much attention."

"No," she laughed, "he is too fond of himself to notice such things. And the Englishman was too absorbed in what the vicomte was saying."

In the course of my career I remember having only twice assumed a disguise, and this was one of the occasions. I do not aspire to rival M. Gemier or Mr. Beerbohm Tree in the art of making one's self unrecognizable; but, with a few touches about the eyes, the nose, with a dark wig and dyed eyebrows, I felt pretty safe as I issued forth to enter the enemy's camp.

At ten o'clock in the evening I presented myself at the "Club" in the Rue Maubeuge. As I expected, I was informed that only members had a right to enter; but the doorkeeper took my card, after which a gentleman came down-stairs, eyed me narrowly, asked me for my address, and, apparently satisfied with my appearance, remarked that I could join as a country member.

"It is not quite regular," he said, "for me to admit you before you are properly introduced; but, as you do not reside in Paris, and intend to return soon to Limoges, we will allow you to come in now, on payment of the entrance fee. You must be duly proposed and seconded."

I knew the old story; I had heard it before.

I then entered the baccarat room, where, around a long table, covered with green baize, a dozen persons were seated. I looked about me. It was still early, and the business of the evening had not begun. The players were of the ordinary type. The majority of them were pigeons ready to be plucked, the rest bore the undeniable stamp of the professional gambler. My attention, however, was centered on the croupier.

Few people—even those in the habit of risking their money in fashionable clubs or in casinos of well-known watering-places—have a remote idea of the important post this official holds. With a long, flat, wooden scoop—something like a cricket-bat—he rakes in the counters from the losers, and pays the winning side.

In great clubs, these men are carefully watched to avoid any trickery; but in the small gambling-dens their role is altogether a different one. When some one opens one of these dens, which, being clubs, can be raided only with difficulty, the croupier becomes his partner. Both are bent on robbery.

If the proprietor—always a professional sharper—takes the bank, he will cheat the players by a series of tricks, too numerous to be explained here. When, however, a guileless stranger acts as banker, the croupier's role comes in; for, while he rakes in the money for the banker, a portion of it disappears into his pockets in a manner which only the most expert eye can detect.

For the benefit of the uninitiated I will explain the principles of the game:

The players sit on the right and left of the banker, who has several complete packs of cards in front of him. When the players have staked their money, the banker deals one card to the right, one card to the left, and one to himself. He repeats this operation.

One of the players on either side of the banker takes up the cards and plays them against the banker for his side of the table.

The object of the game is to score nine—not more—or as near that number as possible—with the two cards; a third card can be had if desired. Court-cards and tens are valueless. If the total of the spots comes to more than ten, ten must be deducted.

If the banker's score is below that of the player's he loses; if above, he wins.

Slowly the room began to fill, and toward half-past eleven a tall, thin man with a grayish beard and small piercing eyes came in; from the description given me I recognized the Vicomte de St——. He smoked a cigarette, paying little attention to what went on at the table, where a banker, with only three hundred francs in the bank, was dealing his cards in a desultory fashion.

All at once the vicomte's face brightened, and he went up with extended hands to some fashionably dressed men who had just entered. I guessed they were what in gambling-house parlance is called "Big Game." I then gave up my seat at the table, where I was too much in view, and stood behind the players, where I could watch everything.

A bright-looking youth took the bank for five thousand francs, and play began in real earnest. Somebody called "Banco" (staking all there is in the bank), and the excitement rose to a high pitch.

Thus far the vicomte had not joined in the game; at last, to my delight, I saw him take a bank, also for five thousand francs. He called for fresh cards.

This call for fresh cards at such a time demands an explanation. In the gambling world it is well known that after the cards have been shuffled, cut, and placed in front of the banker, it is easy for the latter, by sleight of hand, to put a few prepared cards on the top that will give him two or three winning deals. If, therefore, the banker asks for fresh cards, the uninitiated—and, unfortunately, they form the majority—suppose that no trickery is possible. I am sorry to have to disabuse them.

The worst swindles are practiced with so-called new packs. I say "so-called," because in the directorial sanctum they have undergone a curious process. The pack is held over a steaming kettle, the wrapper skilfully removed, the cards taken out, arranged to give the dealer the advantage, and again carefully replaced in the original wrapper.

The study I had in former years been compelled to make of these practices, now proved useful, and I moved behind the vicomte's chair so as not to lose one of his movements.

Five new packs were brought in, and the croupier undid the four, leaving one on the mantlepiece. He shuffled the four packs with a great deal of zest, yet so dexterously that their order was not changed. The man was a great expert in the "sham-shuffling" trick.

Of all the people in the room I, certainly, was the most interested in the game, for I was playing for higher stakes than any of them—for a man's honor. Supposing these cards, brought on a tray, should not have been tampered with; supposing the vicomte played a fair game, without any attempt at cheating; my whole combination fell to the ground, and I should have to invent another mode of attack.

I held my breath when the first cards were dealt; and then a feeling of relief came over me, for I at once recognized the famous combination, known as the "705," or, more appropriately, the "Lightning Flash," because of the rapidity with which it cleans out its victims. And, by way of curiosity, I give below this extraordinary series, from which it will be seen that, with the exception of two deals, where banker and players have the same points, the former wins every coup. The players may cut as many times as they like; it will not affect the game!*

A quarter of an hour later the vicomte rose. He smiled, and could well afford to do so, for he had made a big haul. Three o'clock struck; the last bank, a small one, had been dealt. Everybody left, and I was on the sofa, pretending to be asleep.

"Who's that?" I heard the vicomte ask.

"Oh, it's a chap from Limoges. He came to-night for the first time," was the reply.

I jumped up and said to the vicomte:

"I want a few moments' conversation with you."

He looked hard at me, and conducted me to the next room. I took off my wig; but before I could utter a word, the vicomte placed himself in front of the door.

"Get away from there!" I commanded. "I am M. Goron. Don't attempt any nonsense, or I call up my men, and have you and your croupier taken to the depot!"

He could not suppose that I had come unaccompanied, and silently took a chair.

"Perhaps you will tell me what all this means?" he asked.

"Certainly. But first ring the bell and send away your servants."

My orders were obeyed.

"And now," I continued, "follow me into the card room."

I led the way, and from the mantelpiece took the fifth pack, left there when the vicomte had dealt the cards.

The croupier, who had remained behind, moved toward the door.

"Come here!" I shouted to him. "Take off your coat and waistcoat, and hand them to me."

He did so, trembling with fear, and out of several long pockets, lined with velvet to deaden the sound, I took a handful of counters.

"You scoundrel!" I said, "I watched you do this. And now, clear out; I want to talk to your master—and accomplice."

I handed the vicomte the pack of cards I had taken up, and said:

"Let me call them over to you with my back turned. Seven, nought, five, nine, nought—I forget the rest; but I think this ought to be enough. I have seen the 'Lightning Flash' done before. Do you want any more reasons why I came here tonight?"

He seemed stunned, and shook his head.

"Cannot this scandal be avoided?" he asked.

"Expect nothing from me, until you have told me the whole truth about the Allen B—— affair at Madame J——'s. What was the object of that conspiracy, and who is at the bottom of it?"

He looked at me with a cunning expression.

"I think I see your game, Monsieur Goron. Allow me to compliment you on your skill. In other words, you want me to make certain disclosures. In that case, it is but right I should—"

I gave him no time to finish his sentence, but, seizing him roughly by the arm, shouted:

"I arrest you, you scamp!"

What I expected happened. The coward in him came to the fore. He cringed and crawled, and then told me he had instructed Bernard T—— to slip the cards in poor Allen B——'s pockets.

"Whose orders did you carry out?"

"An Englishman's."

"Harold W——, or, in reality, Edward K——?"

He gave me a surprised glance.

"Yes."

"For what reason?"

"I don't know. You can believe me. It is a secret between him and Allen B——, and I would never have done this thing had I not been in Edward K——'s hands. He compelled me to do it."

He put his statement down in writing, and then took me to his apartment, where, at my request, he handed me two letters from Edward K——.

I was on the point of leaving when I remembered Mademoiselle Marthe.

"Sit down again, and write a note to the police commissary in your district, that you wish to withdraw your charge against Marthe D——."

The vicomte, who had given up feeling surprised at anything, wrote the note, and handed it to me.

It was six o'clock and broad daylight when I reached home. I at once sent for Allen B——.

"Who is Edward K——?" I asked before he had even time to sit down.

"A distant connection. Why?"

"What object had he in disgracing you?"

"He? Impossible—he belongs to a first-class county family."

"Blow your county families! Read this!" and I handed him the vicomte's statement.

I never thought it possible that delight and horror could be expressed at the same time on anybody's face. Allen B—— performed that extraordinary feat. Then he shook me by both hands until my arms ached, and exclaimed:

"What a scoundrel! Who could have dreamed this? Monsieur Goron, it all dawns upon me now. Three years ago that man proposed to a lady to whom I afterward became engaged. She rejected him, and he—"

"That will do. These are family secrets. I don't want to know more than I can help. Leave at once for England. This document and those two letters will clear you, and if anybody wants more information, refer them to me."

He again wrung my hands, too moved to speak; then he took up his hat and stick.

"One more word before you go," I said. "Do you know what strikes me as the queerest part about this queer affair? It is that, while your father and the lady you were about to marry threw you over, without even giving you a hearing, two people here, in Paris—one your humble servant, and the other the daughter of a woman who keeps a gambling house—believed in you. But in this life only the improbable comes true. And now go—I feel tired."

The vicomte and the croupier left Paris the next day. I afterward learned they went to South America.
